The plaintiff, Leon Cook, himself either stopped the machinery or gave the order to stop, so that he might go in and repair the pilot chain and remove any obstruction which hindered the effective operation of the machinery, such as the lightwood knot in the chain at the lower sprocket. The plaintiff (as he himself alleges) "in the performance of his duty got astride of said chain, which, being idle at the time, was slack, and, with the assistance of a helper, removed the obstruction; and at the time the plaintiff was in the act of stepping clear of the dust chain the defendant negligently started the dust engine, and plaintiff was caught therein and injured." But who directly and negligently caused the injury? It was not the defendants, but the fellow servant of the plaintiff who received the request from him not to start the machinery until he came back, or, in other words, the fireman and his helper. We have shown that they were the plaintiff's fellow servants by the highest authority, Kirk v. Railroad, supra, a case decided 35 years ago and which has been frequently cited and approved since that time. That case is identical in principle with this one. The engineer, Harris, was ordered not to move his switch engine until work or inspection required to be done underneath the cars was finished, and he was notified of the fact by the yardmaster. In spite of this order, the engineer did move the train before the work was completed, and the plaintiff's arm was cut off. The railroad company was acquitted of all liability by this court, and, owing to the contrary ruling below, there was a new trial. The yardmaster and the engineer represented the railroad company as much in that case as did the fireman and helper in this one, and yet it was held that there was no liability, because the plaintiff and those two men were fellow servants. The fellow-servant law as to railroad companies has been repealed since that case was decided, but the principle it established is as firmly entrenched as ever, and is applicable wherever the doctrine of fellow servant is still applicable.

The employer in this case could not have supplied anything, whistle or what not, which would have been more effective than the means then at hand to avert the injury. If there had been a whistle or the most approved contrivance in that respect, the result would have been the same if the fireman had been negligent, as he was here, and failed to blow it, and give the proper warning to Cook to get out. The question is not whether there was a whistle, but whether the means available at the time were sufficient to prevent the resultant injury. If the direction had not been given to start the engine, the plaintiff would have escaped without any harm being done to him, there being ample means at hand to prevent it. The parties at the mill were abundantly able to save the plaintiff from any injury, and he would not have been hurt if it had not been for the negligence of his fellow servant who started the machinery or caused it to be started. Leon Cook had finished his work and was in the act of leaving the place when the machinery was put in motion. The mistake was made by the fireman or his helper in supposing that Cook had already left and was in no danger, and this mistake would still have been made had every piece of machinery been supplied with a whistle. What caused the injury was not the want of a whistle, but the reliance of the fireman or helper upon his own mere supposition, to which he carelessly trusted, that Cook had left the place of danger, instead of having certain knowledge that he had left, before giving the order to start the machinery.

The fellow-servant doctrine has no force or effect if it does not apply to this case, and the fireman and his helper were surely fellow servants of Cook within the rule stated in Kirk v. Railroad Co., supra.

Finally, the situation could not have been

CROOM v. GOLDSBORO LUMBER CO.

saved by anything the employer could have done. There is no suggestion that the fireman or helper was of a careless habit and known by the employer to be so. It was just the false reliance of the fireman, or his helper, upon mere supposition as to where Cook was, instead of upon actual knowledge, and the result would have been the same if there had been a whistle on the smaller engine, as the fireman and his helper would still have acted upon the same supposition, for they were told not to start the machinery in any event until Cook returned or, to use his words, until he came back. In the Kirk Case the engine had not only a whistle, but also a bell to give signals, by a blast of the one or the ringing of the other, and the engineer used neither, but violated instructions by moving the train. That case and this one are clearly analogous, as there he moved the train without receiving notice from the yardmaster, while here the fireman and his helper started the machinery without notice from Cook, the plaintiff, and caused the injury.

No one questions the principle that the master must furnish a reasonably safe place for the servant to do his work (Marks v. Cotton Mill, 135 N. C. 287, 47 S. E. 432) and that this is a primary duty devolving upon the master which he cannot without liability therefor delegate to another. But that question does not arise here, as plaintiff himself undertook to do the work and to provide for his own safety in his own way. He trusted too much to the fireman and helper, and is himself solely responsible in law for the consequences. Of course, the timber company cannot be liable unless the Camp Manufacturing Company is liable. But there is nothing to charge it with liability, either upon the evidence or under the principle laid down in Logan v. Railroad Co., 116 N. C. 940, 21 S. E. 959, and cases citing it, which will be found in the annotated edition of 116 N. C. page 940, at pages 952, 953, 21 S. E. 959, and in Shepard's N. C. Citations (1st Ed.) at page 172, and issue of June, 1921, Advance Sheets, at page 46.

It further appears that the Logan Case, supra, does not apply here, as it was distinctly put upon the ground that the North Carolina Railroad Company was a quasi public corporation, and could not, therefore, lease its road and discharge itself from liability for neglect of the duties it owed to the public. It exercised, at least in a quasi sense, a public franchise, granted to it by the state in its sovereign capacity, and could not discharge itself to perform its public duties by a lease, without responsibility for injuries to others caused by the negligence of the lessor in operating the road.

My conclusion is that the nonsuit was proper, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

1. Husband and wife ⇨221—Martin Act construed.

The practical effect of the Martin Act (C. S. § 2507) is to constitute a married woman a free trader as to all her ordinary dealings, and to invest her with the privileges of suing and being sued alone.

2. Husband and wife ⇨126(1)—Wife's earnings not part of husband's wages under employment contract.

In an action for wrongful discharge under an employment contract whereby plaintiff alleged he was to receive $16 a week, where the evidence showed he was to receive $15 and his wife $1 per week, but not that both sums were to be paid plaintiff, held that the intentment of the law was in conflict with plaintiff's claim, in view of C. S. §§ 2507, 2513, relating to rights of married women, and it was not error to instruct that plaintiff's recovery could not exceed $15 a week.

3. Trial ⇨365(1)—Finding of employment as alleged not conclusive as to rate of wages.

Where plaintiff in an action for wrongful discharge alleged he was to receive $16 a week, and there was evidence that he was to be paid only $15, his wife receiving $1, a finding that he was employed "as alleged in the complaint" did not show he was so employed so as to make it error to limit recovery to $15 a week; the finding being made with reference to such limitation.

4. Contracts ⇨10(1)—Mutuality essential.

One of the essential elements of every contract is mutuality; there must be neither doubt nor difference between the parties, and their minds must meet as to all the terms.

5. Master and servant ⇨3(1)—Essentials of contract for services enumerated.

A contract for services must be certain and definite as to the nature and extent of the services to be performed, the place where and the person to whom it is to be rendered, and the compensation to be paid.

6. Master and servant ⇨41(6)—Evidence of agreement to pay increased wages held insufficient.

Where plaintiff in an action for wrongful discharge alleged that he was to receive a raise in wages to be fixed at a future time, evidence as to the amount of increase held insufficient to show an enforceable agreement.

7. Master and servant ⇨41(1)—Measure of damages for wrongful discharge stated.

Where a servant wrongfully discharged was to receive a certain sum per week with house and fuel, and after the discharge and for the remainder of the term he earned a certain amount and paid out a certain amount for support of himself and his family, held, that, to ascertain damages, the additional expense for support during the remainder of the term of employment should be deducted from the amount earned during such time, and the remainder should in turn be deducted from the value of the contract represented by the sum of the unpaid wages and the worth of the house and fuel, with interest from the termination of the period of employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Olav Croom against the Goldsboro Lumber Company. From a judgment for nominal damages only, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

The plaintiff alleges that in December, 1917, he was employed by the defendant to do certain work during the year 1918, for which he was to receive $16 a week, fuel and house rent free, together with an increase in wages to be fixed in the following April; that he entered upon and continued in the defendant's service until May, 1918, when he was wrongfully discharged, and that he has suffered damages in the sum of $500. Denying the material allegations of the complaint, the defendant alleges that the plaintiff was employed by the day; that for stated periods he rendered no service; that, careless and neglectful of his duties, he caused the defendant financial loss, and thereby forced the defendant to discharge him from its service.

The issues were answered as follows:

"(1) Did the defendant employ the plaintiff under the agreement as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.

"(2) If so, did the defendant wrongfully and in breach of its agreement discharge the plaintiff as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.

"(3) What damage, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? A. $1.

"(4) What was the unpaid part of the wages for the year as fixed by the contract? A. $495.

"(5) What was the house and fuel fairly and reasonably worth that defendant was to furnish plaintiff for the balance of the year after plaintiff's discharge? A. $60.

"(6) What amount of money did the plaintiff earn and receive for the service after his discharge to the end of the year? A. $562.75.

"(7) What was the additional expense, if any, incurred by plaintiff, Croom, in necessary support of himself and family for balance of the year after his discharge? A. $246."

After the jury had answered the remaining issues, his honor answered the third issue as an inference of law, each party reserving the right to except. His honor held that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment only for the difference between the amount of the unpaid wages for the year fixed by the contract and of the reasonable worth of the house rent and fuel, to wit, $555 (the sum of the answers of the fourth and fifth issues), and the amount earned by the plaintiff after his discharge, to wit, $562.75 (the answer to the sixth issue), and that, as the latter exceeds the former, the plaintiff could recover nothing more than nominal damages for the defendant's breach of its contract. Accordingly judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for $1 as nominal damages and the cost of the action. Having entered exceptions, the plaintiff appealed.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellant.
Thomas D. Warren, of New Bern, and Cowper, Whitaker & Allen, of Kinston, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. In his complaint the plaintiff alleges that by the terms of the contract he was to be paid $16 a week in part compensation for his services. On the trial there was evidence for the plaintiff tending to show that he was to be paid $15 a week for his personal services, and his wife $1 a week for certain services to be rendered by her. His honor charged the jury that the plaintiff could not recover the amount claimed to be payable on account of the wife's services, and that the plaintiff's wages, if allowed by the jury, could not exceed the rate of $15 a week. To this instruction the plaintiff excepted.

[1] Subject to definite restrictions, the right of a married woman to make an executory contract is governed chiefly by the provisions of chapter 51 of the Consolidated Statutes. It is not necessary, however, to discuss the meaning or purpose of the several statutes affecting the contractual rights of married women, inasmuch as the contract declared on was executed after the enactment of sections 2507 and 2513, which are controlling in the question under consideration. The practical effect of section 2507 (the Martin Act) is to constitute a married woman a free trader as to all her ordinary dealings, and to invest her with the privileges of suing and being sued alone. Price v. Electric Co., 160 N. C. 450, 76 S. E. 502; Lipinsky v. Revell, 167 N. C. 508, 83 S. E. 820; Royal v. Southerland, 168 N. C. 406, 84 S. E. 708, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 623; Kirkpatrick v. Crutchfield, 178 N. C. 343, 100 S. E. 602. Section 2513 is as follows:

"The earnings of a married woman by virtue of any contract for her personal service, and any damages for personal injuries, or other tort sustained by her, can be recovered by her suing alone, and such earnings or recovery shall be her sole and separate property as fully as if she had remained unmarried."

Counsel for the plaintiff, while advertent to these statutes, urge two objections against their application: First, that the contract was made with the plaintiff, and the agreement to pay $1 to the wife merely enlarges the amount to be paid to the plaintiff, in view of the implied intention of the parties that the wife, during the plaintiff's temporary absence, should give personal attention to the performance of duties devolving upon him; and, in the second place, that as the plaintiff has declared on the defendant's agreement to pay the plaintiff $16 a week, the answer to the first issue indicates that the plaintiff was employed as alleged.

[2] We are of opinion that the first objection cannot prevail. The relevant statement in the case on appeal is this:

"The evidence of the plaintiff tended to establish the fact that he was to be paid $15 per week and his wife was to be paid $1 per week for certain services to be rendered by her."

Nowhere does it appear that the defendant agreed to pay both these amounts to the plaintiff, and in the absence of evidence to this effect the intendment of the law is in conflict with the plaintiff's contention.

[3] Nor is the second objection available to the plaintiff. His honor instructed the jury that the plaintiff, if allowed damages, should be allowed wages only at the rate of $15 a week, and the answer to the first issue must be interpreted with reference to this instruction. State v. Murphy, 157 N. C. 615, 72 S. E. 1075; Richardson v. Edwards, 156 N. C. 590, 72 S. E. 482; Donnell v. Greensboro, 164 N. C. 332, 80 S. E. 377.

The first exception is therefore overruled.

The second exception also is untenable. It is directed to the question whether there was sufficient evidence of the defendant's agreement to pay the plaintiff increased wages. The allegation is that the plaintiff was to receive certain compensation "with a raise in wages, to be fixed in April following." There was evidence tending to show that his wages were to be increased in April, and that in May the wages of one employee who had continued in the defendant's service were increased from $2 to $3 a day, and the wages of another about 33½ per cent. But the quantum or measure of increase in the plaintiff's wages was neither alleged nor proved. The court held that the evidence was not sufficient to show an enforceable agreement by the defendant to increase the plaintiff's wages, and the plaintiff duly excepted.

[4, 5] One of the essential elements of every contract is mutuality of agreement. There must be neither doubt nor difference between the parties. They must assent to the same thing in the same sense, and their minds must meet as to all the terms. If any portion of the proposed terms is not settled, or no mode agreed on by which they may be settled, there is no agreement. 13 C. J. 264. A contract for service must be certain and definite as to the nature and extent of the service to be performed, the place where and the person to whom it is to be rendered, and the compensation to be paid, or it will not be enforced. 6 R. C. L. 644. The evidence as to the wages is equally indefinite if it be considered as tending to show an agreement to make a future contract.

"Unless an agreement to make a future contract is definite and certain upon the subjects to be embraced therein, it is nugatory. Consequently the acceptance of a proposition to make a contract the terms of which are to be subsequently fixed does not constitute a binding obligation. The reason for this rule is that there would be no way by which the court could determine what sort of a contract the negotiations would result in; no rule by which the court could ascertain what damages, if any, might follow a refusal to enter into such future contract on the arrival of the time specified. Therefore a contract to enter into a future contract must specify all its material and essential terms, and leave none to be agreed upon as a result of future negotiations." 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 175.

"If no breach of the contract can be assigned which can be measured by any test of damages from the contract, it has been said to be too indefinite to be enforceable." 1 Page on Contracts, § 28; Elks v. Ins. Co., 159 N. C. 626, 75 S. E. 808.

[6] In the absence of allegation and proof as to what the increased wages should be there is no accurate test by which the plaintiff's damages could be measured.

Exceptions 3, 4, 5, and 6 present but one question and may be considered together. The court no doubt submitted to the jury the fifth issue and the seventh with the twofold purpose of presenting the conflicting views of the parties as to the measure of the plaintiff's damages, and of determining the entire controversy by one verdict. Upon the trial the plaintiff contended that in answering the third issue as a conclusion of law the court should deduct from the answer to the sixth issue the answer to the seventh, leaving the net amount of the plaintiff's earnings after his discharge to be deducted from the value of his contract as found in response to the fourth and fifth issues; and the defendant contended that the answer to the seventh issue was immaterial and should be disregarded. His honor held with the defendant, and these exceptions challenge the correctness of his honor's ruling.

In 20 A. & E. Ency. (2d Ed.) 37, it is said:

"Where the action is brought subsequent to the expiration of the term of employment, the decisions are practically unanimous to the effect that the measure of damages is prima facie the wages for the unexpired portion of the term, this amount to be diminished by such sums as the servant has earned, or might have earned, by a reasonable effort to obtain other employment in the same line of business."

This proposition is cited with approval in Smith v. Lumber Co., 142 N. C. 26, 54 S. E. 788, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439. In Hendrickson v. Anderson, 50 N. C. 247, an overseer, employed upon a special contract for a year, was discharged during the year, and brought suit to recover the entire stipulated sum. This court said:

"The question necessarily arises: What is the amount of the damages which he [the plaintiff] ought to be allowed to recover? The proper answer would seem to be the amount which he has actually sustained in consequence of the defendant's default. It would seem to be a dictate of reason that, if one party to a contract be injured by the breach of it by the other, he ought to be put into the same condition as if the contract had been fully performed on both sides. He certainly ought not to be a loser by the fault of the other; nor can he be a gainer without introducing into a broken contract the idea of something like vindictive damages. The true rule then is to give him neither more nor less than the damages which he has actually sustained."

This case has been approved in Brinkley v. Swicegood, 65 N. C. 628; Oldham v. Kerchner, 79 N. C. 112, 28 Am. Rep. 302; Markham v. Markham, 110 N. C. 356, 14 S. E. 963; Smith v. Lumber Co., supra.

In several jurisdictions the doctrine of constructive service has been repudiated, and in its place has been adopted the method of suing for damages for breach of the contract of employment. But the trend of judicial opinion, in analogy to the constructive service idea, seems to be toward regarding the contract price as a material, if not the controlling, element for consideration in the estimation of damages, both in jurisdictions in which the doctrine of constructive service has been repudiated and in those in which it has been retained. Howay v. Going-Northrup Co., 24 Wash. 88, 64 Pac. 135, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 82, 85 Am. St. Rep. 942. In Smith v. Lumber Co., supra, Walker, J., says:

"If the doctrine of constructive service is illogical, in view of the right of the master to have the damages diminished by showing that the servant engaged in other business, and consequently was not ready to perform the service, it does not follow that the rule itself as to damages is not a sound one, for other cogent reasons may have been assigned in its support. The employee, by no fault of his own, loses his wages, which are fixed by the contract, and their amount should be the true measure of his damages under the ordinary rule obtaining in the case of other contracts." 142 N. C. 35, 36, 54 S. E. 788, 790 (5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 439).

In jurisdictions in which the contract is held to be the measure of damages for breach of a contract of employment it is only prima facie so, and where other employment, or the duty to seek other employment, is taken into consideration, the measure of damages suffered by an employee because of a wrongful discharge is the actual injury sustained, or the loss of the value of the contract. Perry v. Simpson, 37 Conn. 520. Here, then, two questions arise: (1) What was the value of the plaintiff's contract with the defendant? (2) In what amount has the value of the contract been impaired by the defendant's breach?

[7] As shown by the answer to the fourth and fifth issues, the jury found the value of the contract to be $555. To what extent has such value been impaired by the breach? Evidently to the extent of the plaintiff's actual loss. The measure of his loss is the difference between the value of the contract and the net amount earned after his discharge.

It has been suggested that the plaintiff, after his discharge, enjoyed advantages not provided in the original contract. He seems also to have received better wages; and, if this question was in fact raised upon the trial, we must assume that it was considered in connection with the issues submitted to the jury. It will be observed that the expenses incurred by the plaintiff after his discharge were not elective, but necessary as well as additional to those he would have incurred had the defendant performed the contract. Shall the plaintiff's loss, caused by his wrongful discharge, become the defendant's asset? It would be inequitable to say that the plaintiff shall not abate to the extent of additional and necessary expenses the amount earned by him after his wrongful discharge. Van Winkle v. Satterfield, 58 Ark. 617, 25 S. W. 1113, 23 L. R. A. 855; Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan, 6 Ind. App. 109, 32 N. E. 802, 51 Am. St. Rep. 300. We hold, then, that the answer to the seventh issue should be deducted from that of the sixth, and the remainder, $318.75, should in turn be deducted from the value of the contract, represented by the sum of the answers to the fourth and fifth issues, and that the answer to the third issue should be $238.25, with interest from the termination of the period of the plaintiff's employment, to wit, January 1, 1919. 24 Wash. 88, 64 Pac. 135, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 91, 85 Am. St. Rep. 942; Bond v. Cotton Mills, 166 N. C. 20, 81 S. E. 936; Chatham v. Realty Co., 174 N. C. 675, 94 S. E. 447.

The judgment entered upon the verdict, as herein modified, is affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

MARTIN v. McBRYDE. (No. 228.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1022(2) — Referee's findings approved by trial court and supported by evidence not reviewable.

Where there is evidence to support referee's findings of fact, and they are approved by the trial judge, they are not reviewable.

2. Partnership ⇨110—One partner could sue another for supplies furnished the other in separate business.

Plaintiff was not precluded by the fact that there was a partnership between him and defendant from suing defendant for supplies furnished defendant personally for the express purpose of enabling him to supply his hands who were operating his mill plant, with which plaintiff had no connection, except as book-keeper.

3. Attachment ⇨267—Held not dissolved by substitution of bond as security.

In action for supplies furnished, attachment against the property of the proprietor of a sawmill and lumber plant was set aside at the request of the receiver of the sawmill, in order that operations could be resumed, on condition that "the latter" keep in his possession 400,000 feet of lumber pending further hearing, which should be subject to any liens legally asserted by plaintiff. Later, on contempt proceedings brought because defendant was disposing of the lumber outside the state, defendant with the court's approval filed a $5,000 bond to stand in place of the 400,000 feet of lumber, "conditioned to pay any lien judgment" recovered by plaintiff. Held, that the court's action under Revisal 1908, §§ 774, 775, did not discharge the attachment on the merits, but the bond was held as substituted security and as representing the lien for which it was substituted.

4. Attachment ⇨210—Defects waived by appearance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Bond, Judge.

Action by J. Reid Martin against D. L. McBryde. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover the sum of $3,863.90, alleged to be due by account stated. An attachment was issued and levied upon certain personal property of the defendant, an itemized list of which was annexed by the sheriff to his return. The attachment was afterwards ordered by Judge Devin to be set aside at the request of J. F. Parker, receiver, in order that the operations of the Garland Lumber Company could be resumed under its contract with defendant, and it was further ordered that "the latter" keep in his possession at least 400,000 feet of lumber pending the further hearing of this cause on the return day thereof, "which lumber shall be subject to any liens which the plaintiff may legally assert against the same."

The plaintiff alleged on affidavit that McBryde was disposing of the lumber, or had already disposed of it, in disobedience of the former order of the court, whereupon Judge Guion ordered that defendant show cause why he should not be attached for contempt, and afterwards discharged the rule upon the defendant's filing a sufficient bond in the sum of $5,000, which should stand in the place of the lumber ordered to be held by the defendant for the purpose mentioned in the former order, and "shall be conditioned to pay any such lien judgment as plaintiff may recover against defendant herein."

The court appointed a referee to take and state the account. He made his report, which was set aside so that defendant might introduce further evidence; the notice to him of the hearing of the referee having been deficient. Thereupon Mr. Richard L. Herring was appointed referee for the same purpose, and he filed the following second and final report, as it is termed in the case:

"To the Superior Court of Sampson County:

"The undersigned, Richard L. Herring, referee, appointed in this cause by order of his honor O. H. Guion, judge, having formerly made a report on January 29, 1921, and said cause having been referred to said referee by order of Hon. W. M. Bond, judge at March term, 1921, of the superior court of Sampson county, begs to report as follows:

"On April 5, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon, in the law office of Grady & Graham, Clinton, N. C., the plaintiff being absent in person, but represented by counsel, Henry A. Grady, and the defendant being present in person and also represented by counsel, Messrs. Q. K. Nimocks and E. S. Smith, the defendant proceeded to offer his evidence, which is contained in the typewritten report thereof herewith sent to the court, the plaintiff having heretofore by consent at a former meeting offered in evidence the same testimony that was offered before J. Abner Barker, referee, which appears in the file; and upon all of the evidence, pleadings, exhibits, and admissions of the parties the referee makes the following findings of fact, it being agreed by all parties that this report should be heard and passed upon at May term, 1921, all parties waiving time:

"First. That heretofore, prior to January 1, 1915, the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in the mercantile business at Garland, N. C., under the firm name and style of South River Supply Company, and on said January 1, 1915, the defendant, D. L. McBryde, conveyed to the plaintiff, W. Reid Martin, all of his right, title, and interest in and to said mercantile business by written conveyance filed with the referee and marked Exhibit E. The referee finds that said paper writing was intended as a chattel mortgage, made for the purpose of securing the plaintiff for certain moneys advanced by him in the conduct of said business.

"Second. That during the conduct of the business the said D. L. McBryde was operating a large sawmill and lumber plant near the town of Garland, which was not connected with the South River Supply Company; that he employed a number of hands and made settlement with said hands with metal pay checks, which were cashed at the store of the plaintiff at par; that it was understood and agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that said pay checks should be received at the store of the plaintiff, as cash, with the further understanding and agreement that the plaintiff should hold said checks in the same manner, and that the same should be collectible upon the same basis as if held by the original parties from whom they were purchased by the plaintiff, and in furtherance of this agreement the defendant executed a certain paper writing in words and figures as follows:

"April 1, 1914.

"W. Reid Martin, Proprietor, South River Supply Company, Garland, N. C.—Dear Sir: I hereby authorize you to handle and accept metal pay checks that I issue to my laborers in exchange for their work, the same to be due and payable to you on my regular pay days, the same as if held by said laborers, and I hereby agree that all accounts and holdings of same due and collectible on the same basis as if held by the original parties to whom the checks are paid.

"Yours respectfully, D. L. McBryde."

"Third. That during the course of business the plaintiff purchased from the laborers of the defendant, under the agreement referred to in the second finding of fact, metal pay checks, amounting in value of $5,404.06.

"Fourth. That this action was commenced on October 13, 1916, and thereafter, on October 17, 1916, J. F. Parker, receiver of the Commonwealth Land & Timber Company, came into court and made himself a party to this action, and upon affidavits filed by the said J. F. Parker and others an order was entered by Hon. W. A. Devin, judge at Kinston, N. C., dissolving the warrant of attachment which appears in the file, and providing as follows: 'And it is further ordered that the said D. L. McBryde proceed to resume operations under his said contract, as though said attachment had not been issued or served, and that he keep in his possession at least 400,000 feet of lumber pending the further hearing of this cause on the return day thereof, which lumber shall be subject to any liens which the plaintiff may legally assert against the same.'

"Fifth. That thereafter, on or about January 9, 1919, a petition was filed in this cause, alleging that all of said lumber had been disposed of in violation of the order entered by Judge Devin hereinbefore referred to, and thereupon his honor O. H. Guion issued an order requiring the defendant to appear before him at the courthouse in Clinton, N. C., on Saturday, February 8, 1919, and show cause why he should not be punished for disobeying the former orders made in this cause, and thereafter at the hearing of said motion said writ was vacated upon condition that the defendant file a good and sufficient bond in the sum of $5,000, payable to the plaintiff, which bond was filed by the defendant, with W. L. Williams, Jr., B. F. McBryde, and E. S. Smith as sureties thereto, and contains the following provision: 'The condition of this obligation is such that, whereas the plaintiff has sued the defendant herein for a certain alleged indebtedness amounting to $3,668.90, and claims a lien on certain lumber as appears by the pleadings and papers herein: Now, therefore, if the plaintiff shall recover judgment against the defendant herein and shall be adjudged entitled to a lien on said lumber as security for the payment of said judgment or any part thereof not exceeding the amount sued for, and if the defendant shall pay such judgment as the court may find and adjudge subject to such lien then this obligation to be null and void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and effect.'

"Sixth. That the time of the institution of this action D. L. McBryde was indebted to the South River Supply Company on account of metal pay checks taken under the written contract hereinbefore referred to in the sum of $5,404.06, and in addition thereto was personally indebted to said company for goods sold to him individually in the sum of $527.03; so that on the 1st of January, 1917, the assets of said company consisted of the following items:

Cash in bank.....	$ 19 62
Merchandise on hand.....	218 51
Open accounts .....	28 51
Personal account D. L. McBryde.....	527 03
Metal pay checks account.....	5,404 06
Total .....	$6,297 73

"Seventh. That at the time above referred to, January 1, 1917, the South River Supply Company was indebted to plaintiff, Martin, in the sum of $1,754.46 for money loaned to said company from time to time; that the plaintiff has received from the cash in bank, merchandise on hand, and open accounts the sum of $366.65, which should be charged against him and deducted from his one-half interest in the business; so that the account between the two copartners should be stated as follows:

Total assets of the company.....	$6,297 73
Account due Martin for money advanced to company .....	1,754 46
Net worth of business.....	$4,543 27
Of this Martin is entitled to one-half.....	$2,276 685
Of this McBryde is entitled to one-half....	2,276 685
Total .....	$4,543 27
Amount due Martin, one-half of business..	$2,276 685
Less amount received from accounts and cash in bank .....	366 65
Balance .....	$1,910 035
Amount due Martin, one-half business....	$2,276 685
Amount due Martin for money advanced business .....	1,754 46
Total amount due Martin.....	$3,664 495

"Eighth. That at the time of the institution of this action the defendant, McBryde, was in serious financial difficulties, there being many recorded judgments against him; that he was in fear of executions being issued on said judgments and his property seized by his creditors; that he was shipping lumber from Garland, N. C., to J. S. Kent & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., as fast as the railroad facilities would permit, which had the effect of removing the property beyond the reach of the court and of hinder-delaying, and defeating his creditors from collecting the amounts due them, and such was his intention.

"Ninth. That the order requiring the defendant to keep in his possession at Garland, N. C., the 400,000 feet of lumber hereinbefore referred to was consented to by all of the defendants to this action, and was made at the suggestion of defendant J. F. Parker, receiver, and he is bound thereby.

"Upon the foregoing finding of fact the referee makes the following conclusion of law:

"(1) That by reason of the written contract entered into between the defendant and South River Supply Company he thereby created a valid lien upon the lumber, etc., cut at his mill, and subrogated the said South River Supply Company to any rights of lien that might have been asserted by his employees to whom the metal pay checks were given, and to all other remedies that said employees might have asserted.

"(2) That by reason of the fact that the defendant, McBryde, at the time this action was instituted, was financially embarrassed, and was shipping his assets beyond the state, etc., as found in finding of fact No. 8, the issuance of the writ of attachment herein was provident and proper, and the plaintiff thereby secured and was entitled to a valid lien upon all of the property seized by the sheriff, consisting of the 400,000 feet of sawed lumber described in the return of said sheriff.

"(3) That by reason of the fact that the amount due the South River Supply Company by D. L. McBryde on account of metal pay checks is in excess of the total amount due the plaintiff, Martin, the plaintiff is entitled to assert the amount of his recovery as a lien against said 400,000 feet of lumber, and require the defendant McBryde to accept his open account as a credit on his one-half in the business.

"(4) That all of the defendants are bound by the order entered herein requiring the defendant to keep 400,000 feet of lumber on hand to pay any judgment that may be recovered in this action by the plaintiff, which is adjudged to be a lien on the lumber seized by the sheriff, and, by reason of the fact that the $5,000 bond filed herein was substituted in lieu of said lumber, that the defendant and the sureties on said bond are liable for the amount of the recovery adjudged in this action.

"(5) That the plaintiff, Martin, is entitled to recover of the defendant, McBryde, as principal, and B. F. McBryde, E. S. Smith, and W. L. Williams, Jr., sureties, the sum of $5,000, the penalty of the bond filed herein, to be discharged upon payment to the plaintiff, W. Reid Martin, of the sum of $3,664.50, with interest thereon from the 1st day of January, 1917, together with the costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk.

"The date above named, January 1, 1917, is an arbitrary date fixed by the referee on account of the fact that the business was in process of being wound up at that time, said date being subsequent to the issuance of summons herein.

"All of which is respectfully submitted this April 23, 1921.

The defendant filed nine exceptions to this report, each of which was based upon the following ground:

"The defendant excepts to the findings of fact in article — of the referee's report, for that it is contrary to the evidence taken in the case."

And he also filed five exceptions to said report, each of which was based upon the following ground:

"The defendant excepts to the conclusions of law found in article — of the referee's report, for that the same is not a correct conclusion of law based upon the evidence taken in the above cause, and that said conclusion of law was based upon an erroneous finding of fact."

The above exceptions to findings of fact and those to conclusions of law were therefore all alike in form and substance.

The defendant further excepted to said report because the referee failed to nonsuit the plaintiff at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence and again at the close of all the evidence. Judge Bond approved and confirmed the report of Referee Herring in all respects, and rendered judgment against defendant for the sum of $3,663.90 and costs, to include referee's fee of $50 and premium on attachment bond.

Defendant appealed, and assigned the following errors:

"(1) To the referee's denial of defendant's motion for nonsuit.

"(2) To referee's denial of defendant's motion to vacate the attachment.

"(3) To referee's denial of defendant's motion at the close of all evidence for nonsuit.

"(4) To referee's denial of defendant's motion at the close of all evidence to vacate the attachment.

"(5) To the refusal of the presiding judge to sustain the defendant's exceptions to the referee's findings of fact and conclusions of law, as more fully set out in the record.

"(6) To the refusal of the presiding judge to allow defendant's motion of nonsuit and to vacate the attachment made before the referee, as above stated and renewed before the presiding judge at the hearing before him on exceptions to referee's report.

"(7) To the judgment as signed, as appears of record."

Q. K. Nimocks, of Fayetteville, E. S. Smith, of Raeford, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellant.

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is useless to consider the exceptions filed to the referee's report as to the facts further than to say that the judge afterwards reviewed the evidence and findings of fact by the referee, and approved and confirmed the same adopting them as his own. We have repeatedly held that, where this is the case, we will not review the judge's final decision in this respect, where there is evidence to support the findings. Dorsey v. Mining Co., 177 N. C. 60, 62, 97 S. E. 746; Maxwell v. Bank, 175 N. C. 180, 95 S. E. 147; Southern Spruce Co. v. Hayes, 169 N. C. 254, 85 S. E. 382, where this court held:

"As said in another case, McCullers v. Cheatham, 163 N. C. 63: 'The misfortune of the defendants (the plaintiff in the case at bar) in this case is that the referee has found all the essential facts against them, and when these findings were reviewed and approved by the judge, upon consideration of the report and exceptions, there being evidence to warrant them, we are precluded from changing the report in this respect, but must decide the case upon the findings of fact as made by the referee and approved by the court. * * * We will not review the referee's findings of fact, which are settled, upon a consideration of the evidence, and approved by the judge, when exceptions are filed thereto, if there is some evidence to support them.'"

Turning to McCullers v. Cheatham, supra, we find that the following cases are cited there: Boyle v. Stallings, 140 N. C. 524, 58 S. E. 346; Harris v. Smith, 144 N. C. 439, 57 S. E. 122, and cases cited; Thornton v. McNeely, 144 N. C. 622, 57 S. E. 400; Frey v. Lumber Co., 144 N. C. 759, 57 S. E. 464; Thompson v. Smith, 160 N. C. 256, 75 S. E. 1010.

There was some evidence in this case to support the rulings of the referee and judge as to the facts.

Now as to the exceptions taken to the referee's conclusions of law: One ground of these exceptions is that they are not correct conclusions based upon the evidence. The conclusions of law are not based upon the evidence, but upon the facts found by the referee; and the other ground, that the conclusions of law were based upon an erroneous finding of fact, is but saying that the facts were erroneously found by the referee and judge, which we have shown is a matter not reviewable in this court.

When the assignments of error are considered, they really present but two questions: First. Was it error in the court to refuse the motion to nonsuit? Second. Should the referee and judge have vacated the attachment? There may be a third question, which we also will consider, though it is not definitely and sufficiently raised by the defendant in his exceptions and assignments of error, and that is: Could the plaintiff sue the defendant, the latter being his partner, as defendant alleges, and, we think, erroneously.

1. The court did not err in refusing a nonsuit. This really involves the two questions as to the right of plaintiff to sue the defendant and the attachment.

[2] It is contended that the plaintiff could not sue the defendant, because they were partners, and one can sue the other only for a settlement of the partnership affairs. But this, if correct generally, is not so with reference to the particular facts of this case. Here the plaintiff alleges his right to recover damages because he had, upon defendant's request, furnished to him "goods, wares, and merchandise and feed supplies in order that McBryde could carry on the business in which he was then engaged, it being the operation of a lumber and mill plant." This is in no way connected with any partnership affair, but entirely separate therefrom, if any partnership existed, and altogether independent thereof. The following is settled, according to George on Partnership, p. 314 (131):

"A partner may maintain an action at law against his copartner upon a claim due to the one from the other as individuals. The following classes of cases fall within the above rule:

"(a) Claims not connected with the partnership.

"(b) Claims for an agreed final balance.

And Ruling Case Law, vol. 20, p. 926, says:

"The general rule prohibiting the bringing of suits by one partner against another until a balance is struck does not apply to all possible cases which might appear to be within its scope. The limitation may be removed by statute or agreement between the parties. Thus one partner may sue another at law on a promissory note executed by the partnership to him, where there is a statute providing that all contracts which by the common law are joint shall be construed as joint and several, and that in all cases of joint obligations of copartners and others suits may be prosecuted against any one or more of them who are liable."

The general rule, therefore, even as between partners is not inexorable, but has its exceptions. The case of Owen v. Merooney, 136 N. C. 475, 48 S. E. 821, 103 Am. St. Rep. 952 (opinion by the Chief Justice), as reported in 1 Ann. Cas. p. 834, is an apposite one. The substance of it, as stated in the headnote to 1 Ann. Cas., supra, is as follows:

"An action may be maintained by one partner against another to recover damages for the failure of the latter to comply with an agreement made by him as a condition precedent to the formation of the partnership."

There is a valuable note to that case at pages 835 and 836, in which, among other things, it is said:

"Thus an action will lie for a breach of promise to furnish money or property for carrying on the partnership. A partner may recover the damages suffered by him personally, unless ascertainment of such damages involves an examination of the partnership accounts, when the only remedy is in equity."

The note is amply supported by the citation of relevant authorities. And in Newby v. Harrell, 99 N. C. 149, 5 S. E. 234, 6 Am. St. Rep. 503, this court held:

"While the general rule is one partner cannot maintain an action against his copartner to recover money which might have been taken into account of the partnership until after a settlement, he may sue before such settlement to recover for the wrongful conversion or destruction of the joint property or for the loss or destruction of his individual property used in the business, resulting from the negligent use by the other partner."

If the plaintiff, who happens to be a partner, can recover on a promissory note given by the firm to him individually, or for damages suffered by him, in the same way, and resulting from a breach of contract or a tort, there is no conceivable reason why he cannot recover here for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise sold or supplied to defendant, even if the two were partners in the supply business (which is denied), because the goods were furnished to defendant personally for the express purpose of enabling him to supply his hands who were operating his mill plant, with which the plaintiff had no connection except as bookkeeper. The debt due the plaintiff was in no sense an item in any partnership account, and the case in no view falls within the principle invoked by the defendant.

[3] Now as to the lien of plaintiff under the contract with the defendant set forth in the case: The judge did not discharge the attachment on the merits, but he was evidently proceeding or at least in analogy to the proceeding, for a discharge, as authorized by the statute (Pell's Revisal, vol. 1, §§ 774 and 775), and the bond required by the judge and given by the defendant in place of the 400,000 feet of lumber was so conditioned as to require the defendant "to pay any such judgment in the action as plaintiff may recover against him therein," in addition to the bond being held to secure any lien which plaintiff had on the lumber, for which the bond was a substitute; the object of all this being to release the property attached so that defendant or the receiver could use it in the prosecution of the business. It would be a clear perversion of the true intent and purpose for which the bond was allowed to be filed as an accommodation to the defendant so that he might use the property attached or the lumber held in lieu of it, if we should hold otherwise. We must decide according to the letter and spirit of the transaction, and not let the defendant take advantage of his own repudiation of his agreement, upon the faith of which he or the receiver secured the release of the attached property and afterwards of the lumber, so that the work of the mill might proceed.

The referee, in his admirable report upon the facts and the law, has found as a fact, that the defendant, being involved in serious financial difficulties, and being much embarrassed, there being many recorded judgments against him, and while he was in fear of executions being issued against his property, was shipping lumber from Garland, N. C., to points outside the state as rapidly as possible, which had the effect of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors, and such was his intention. The defendant does not say in his exceptions that there was no evidence of those facts, but that they were found by the referee contrary to the evidence. We have already discussed the character of such an exception where the referee's findings have been considered and approved by the judge on exceptions filed to the referee's report. However, there was some evidence to support the findings.

[4] Attention is called by the appellee to the fact that there was no exception taken to the orders of the court as to the lumber or the bond of $5,000, and also to the special condition of the bond requiring any judgment recovered to be paid. The attachment being regular and valid, and intended to bring the defendant before the court to answer in the cause, and the defendant having answered, and the receiver intervened for the purpose of discharging the attachment, for the special purpose just mentioned and substituting security therefor, first, in the form of lumber, and, second, by bond in lieu thereof, it is apparent that it is too late now to claim that the same security, in the form of a lien on the lumber, was not transferred to the bond when it was given in place of that lien, and further that defendant has waived any defect in the attachment (if there was any, and we concur with the referee that there was not) by appearing and pleading to the merits, and further that the court did not vacate the attachment because of any defect therein, or because of insufficient grounds for issuing it, but simply at the request of defendant and the receiver that it be done, so that the prosecution of the mill business, then in the hands of the receiver, would not longer be interrupted. It was held in Rocky Mount Mills v. Railroads, 119 N. C. 693, 25 S. E. 854, 56 Am. St. Rep. 682, affirming order of Hoke, J., refusing to vacate an attachment, that—

"Where a defendant, brought into court on attachment process, subsequently entered a general appearance and filed an answer to the merits, a motion to dismiss the attachment on the ground that it would not lie under the statute was properly refused as immaterial."

In Symons v. Northern, 49 N. C. 241, Judge Battle said:

"A defendant may come into court without process, and confess a judgment (Farley v. Lea, 4 Dev. & Bat. Rep. 169 [20 N. C. 307]), and we cannot perceive any reason why he may not come in, in the same way, and accept the plaintiff's declaration and plead to it. If this be so, why may he not appear and plead upon the defective process? The main object of the leading process is to bring the defendant in to court, and, if he does not choose to object in limine to the manner in which he has been brought in, it would be wrong to allow him to do so after he has, by his acts, admitted himself to be there, ready to defend himself against the plaintiff's action."

See Toms v. Warson, 66 N. C. 417. And in Price v. Sharp, 24 N. C. 417, it was held that—

"In an attachment the defendant, by accepting a declaration and pleading to [the merits], waives all objection to defects in the process."

It perhaps may be useless to state that a lien is acquired by the levy of an attachment (McMillan v. Parsons, 52 N. C. 163), as such a proposition will hardly be gainsaid. Consol. Statutes, § 807. The lien of the original levy created by the statute was not destroyed or vacated, but is now represented by the bond of the defendants, a new form of security, to be sure, but only as a substitute for the old, upon which the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the satisfaction of his debt. The report of referee Herring was properly approved and confirmed by the court in its judgment, which will not be disturbed.

Having taken this view, it is unnecessary to discuss the question as to the alleged laborers' and mechanics' lien arising from possession of the metal checks.

We find no error.

Affirmed.

WRIGHT v. IREDELL TELEPHONE CO.
(No. 330.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

Corporations ¶113—Charter and stock certificate provision against transfer without approval of directors held valid.

There being no statute to the contrary and the Secretary of State being authorized to grant corporate charters by virtue of Const. art. 8, § 1, a provision in a charter granted to a telephone company that shares of the stock therein should not be transferred or sold until reported to and approved by the directors was valid, and a purchaser was not entitled to enforce a transfer over the action by the directors in good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Horton, Judge.

Petition by R. H. Wright for writ of mandamus against the Iredell Telephone Company. Writ refused, and petitioner excepted and appealed. Affirmed.

The writ of mandamus was asked to require the defendant to transfer and issue to the plaintiff certain certificates of its corporate stock. The facts are fully set out in the judgment of the superior court:

"This cause was regularly instituted in the superior court of Durham county by issuance of summons on the 26th day of May, 1920, complaint and answer were duly filed, and it was agreed by the parties that the court should find the facts and enter judgment in accordance with such finding of facts, and after hearing the pleadings and the testimony offered at the trial the court finds the following facts:

"(1) This is a proceeding by mandamus to compel the defendant to transfer to the plaintiff 116 shares of common capital stock of the defendant.

"(2) That prior to the year 1906 the citizens of the city of Statesville and county of Iredell, N. C., enjoyed the benefit of a locally owned independent telephone system; that the Bell Telephone Company had repeatedly made application to the board of aldermen of said city for a franchise to establish its system in said community, and the said board of aldermen had from time to time refused to grant said franchise; that on the — day of —, 1906, the Bell Telephone Company, without notice to the board of aldermen or to the citizens of Statesville, bought out the independent system, and undertook to control and monopolize the telephone business in Statesville, and thereafter charged rates greatly in excess of the rates formerly charged by the independent company for said service.

"(3) That after the purchase of the local system by the Bell Telephone Company, the citizens of said community, in order to free themselves from what they believed to be a monopoly, and for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a local independent telephone system, organized the Iredell Telephone Company, the defendant in this case, and thereupon procured a certificate of incorporation under the general laws of the state on August 22, 1906, said certificate of incorporation containing the provisions hereinafter set out: That said certificate of incorporation was approved by the stockholders of the defendant, and was immediately recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Iredell county, and under and by virtue of said certificate of incorporation the defendant since said time has and is now engaged in the telephone business in the city of Statesville, N. C., under its said certificate of incorporation. That the certificate of incorporation of the defendant, among other things, specifies the objects of the corporation as follows: 'To build, operate, maintain and own an independent telephone business in the city of Statesville, N. C., and generally to carry on an independent telephone system in said city and elsewhere.'

"(4) That at the time of organizing said corporation the stockholders, realizing that unless the sale and transfer of its capital stock was safeguarded that there would be a possibility of a majority of the stock of the corporation being bought up by persons not in harmony with the independent telephone business, and that the control of the corporation would pass directly or indirectly into the hands of unfriendly and antagonistic interests, and that thereupon the stockholders, in order to safeguard their investment and to prevent the said corporation falling into the hands of persons or corporations antagonistic to the objects and purposes of an independent telephone company, procured the Secretary of State to grant the defendant a certificate of incorporation or charter, containing the following limitations upon the sale and transfer of its stock, to wit:

"Section Eleventh. Shares of stock in this corporation shall not be transferred or sold until said sale or transfer shall have been reported to the directors and approved by them."

"(5) That to further safeguard the sale of its stock, as well as to give notice to parties who might attempt to purchase the same of the limitations contained in the charter and the terms upon which said stock was issued, accepted, and held by the stockholders, the defendant caused its certificate of stock to be written in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Certificate of Common Stock.

"Incorporated under the laws of the State of North Carolina.

"No. ——— Shares, ———.

"Iredell Telephone Company, Statesville, N. C.

"This certifies that ——— is the owner of ——— shares of twenty-five dollars each of the capital stock of Iredell Telephone Company, which cannot be sold or transferred until reported to, and approved by, the board of directors, and then transferable only on the books of the corporation by the holder thereof in person or by attorney, upon surrender of this certificate properly indorsed.

"In witness whereof, the said corporation has caused this certificate to be signed by its duly authorized officer and to be sealed with the seal of the corporation at Statesville, N. C.

"This the ——— day of ———, A. D. 190—.

"———, Pres.

"———, Sec'y & Treas."

"(6) That the stock desired by the plaintiff to be transferred to him on the books of the corporation in this action is in the identical language above set out.

"(7) That none of the owners of the stock now held by the plaintiff have complied with the provisions of defendant's charter governing sales and transfers of its stock, and have never complied with the provisions and limitations set out in the certificates of stock, and that none of said owners ever applied to the directors of the defendant for approval of said sale to the plaintiff or the transfer of any of said stock to the plaintiff.

"(8) That the plaintiff has no financial interest in the Southern Bell Telephone Company, but that plaintiff, a Mr. Martin, and two nephews of the plaintiff, own the Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company, of Durham, N. C.; that at the time the plaintiff undertook to acquire shares of stock in the Iredell Telephone Company, there was an agreement or understanding between the Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company of Durham and the Southern Bell Telephone Company, and the American Bell Telephone Company could use the office of the Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company of Durham, N. C., for long distance, the Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company of Durham, N. C., receiving a commission on all outgoing long distance messages. The Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company of Durham had under such agreement no right to build long distance lines to points where the Bell Telephone had long distance lines. The Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company was doing the local business in Durham, and the Southern Bell and American Bell were doing the long distance business. The Southern Bell and the American Bell had no local line in Durham; that the plaintiff knew there was competition between the Southern Bell Telephone Company and the Iredell Telephone Company, at Statesville, and the plaintiff and his associates bought out the Bell Company at Statesville, and that the Iredell Telephone Company has never paid any dividends on its stock, and that the plaintiff had no knowledge of what rates were charged by the Southern Bell Telephone Company in Statesville, or anything about the controversy between the Iredell Telephone Company and the Southern Bell Telephone Company in Statesville, N. C., other than that there was competition between them.

"(9) That the plaintiff is in the possession of more than 116 shares of the capital stock of the defendant, he having attempted to purchase said shares of stock, and has paid a valuable consideration therefor, and never purchased any stock in the Southern Bell Telephone Company. That the plaintiff has never been able to get the shares of stock in the defendant transferred to him on the books of the company, and has never been permitted to vote in any of the meetings of the stockholders of the defendant.

"(10) That on the ——— day of August, 1917, the plaintiff applied to the defendant's directors to have the stock held by him transferred; that thereupon, in pursuance of power contained in the certificate of incorporation and also written in the face of each share of stock issued by the defendants, the said directors met, and, after carefully considering the matter, acting in good faith, declined to approve the transfer of said stock to the plaintiff, and declined to approve the sale or transfer of said stock to the plaintiff. The action of the board of directors was put in writing, and was duly communicated to the plaintiff. The answer of the board of directors was as follows, to wit:

"This board, after duly considering the matter, disapproved the sale of said stock to Mr. Wright, but approved of the sale of stock by said stockholders at the price offered to the agents of Mr. Wright, and have secured purchasers therefor who are local citizens and stockholders of the Iredell Company, and in sympathy with the independent telephone business, and engaged in building up the Iredell Telephone Company as an independent telephone company, and are ready, upon delivery of said stock properly indorsed, to pay therefor in cash."

"On the foregoing finding of facts the court is of the opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed, and it is ordered and adjudged by the court that the writ of mandamus be, and the same is hereby, denied, and the plaintiff taxed with the costs.

"J. Lloyd Horton, Judge," etc.

From the foregoing judgment, the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

W. D. Turner, of Statesville, and Fuller, Reade & Fuller, of Durham, for appellant.

Bryant, Brogden & Bryant, of Durham, and H. P. Grier, of Statesville, for appellee.

STACY, J. It appears from the facts found by his honor and embodied in the judgment of the superior court that, prior to the year 1906, the people of Statesville and Iredell county enjoyed the benefits of a locally owned independent telephone system. The Southern Bell Telephone Company had repeatedly made application to the board of aldermen of the city of Statesville for a franchise to establish its system in said community, but this request had been consistently denied. Whereupon, in 1906, the Southern Bell Telephone Company, without notice to the board of aldermen or the citizens of Statesville, bought out the independent system, and undertook to control and to monopolize the telephone business at rates greatly in excess of those formerly charged in said locality. In order to rid the community of this situation, and for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a local independent telephone system, the Iredell Telephone Company, defendant herein, was organized by a number of interested citizens who lived in the city of Statesville. For reasons which seemed compelling to the incorporators, and which they deemed necessary to safeguard the interests of stockholders in the defendant company, there was embraced in the certificate of incorporation the following limitation on the sale and transfer of stock:

"Shares of stock in this corporation shall not be transferred or sold until said sale or transfer shall have been reported to the directors and approved by them."

The charter was duly approved and issued by the Secretary of State, accepted by the incorporators, and the certificates of stock, issued to each stockholder, contained a statement on the face of said stock that it could not "be sold or transferred until reported to, and approved by, the board of directors, and then only transferable on the books of the corporation by the holder thereof in person or by attorney," etc.

The plaintiff, a resident of Durham, has in his possession 116 shares of stock of the defendant corporation which in August, 1917, he demanded that the directors transfer to him. The directors met, and, after carefully considering plaintiff's demand, and acting in good faith, declined to approve the sale and transfer of said stock, and made the following order in reference thereto, which was communicated to the plaintiff:

"This board, after duly considering the matter, disapproved the sale of said stock to Mr. Wright, but approves of the sale of said stock by said stockholder, at the price offered to the agents of Mr. Wright, and have secured purchasers therefor who are local citizens and stockholders of the Iredell Telephone Company and in sympathy with the independent business and engaged in building up the Iredell Telephone Company as an independent telephone company, and are ready, upon delivery of said stock, properly indorsed, to pay therefor in cash."

The plaintiff contends that the aforesaid restrictions and powers granted defendant in its charter, and set out in its certificates of stock, are against public policy, and therefore void. On the other hand, the defendant contends that said provisions are just, proper, and reasonable limitations on the sale and transfer of its stock, and that the action of its directors in refusing to transfer the 116 shares to the plaintiff, but approving said sales at the price offered by his agents, and securing purchasers therefor who were in sympathy with the objects and purposes of the defendant, was within the rights granted to the defendant, and did not and does not constitute any unreasonable restraint upon the power of alienation.

We have found no statute in the laws of this state forbidding restrictions and limitations in the sale and transfer of stock in corporations. And it would seem that where the Legislature, in the exercise of its constitutional grant, or reservation (article 8, § 1, Const.) has authorized the Secretary of State to issue certificates of incorporation and approve the application for charters, the provisions of such charters, not inconsistent with the Legislative policy and so approved by the Secretary of State, have, at least, the force and effect of a valid agreement, and binding as between the stockholders who take with notice of such provisions. Dempster Mfg. Co. v. Downs, 126 Iowa, 80, 101 N. W. 735, 106 Am. St. Rep. 340, 3 Ann. Cas. 187, and note. As bearing somewhat upon this point, see, also, White v. Kincaid, 149 N. C. 415, 63 S. E. 109, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1177, 128 Am. St. Rep. 663.

In the case of Longyear v. Hardman, 219 Mass. 405, 106 N. E. 1012, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1200, Rugg, C. J., in an opinion of great force and clearness, states this position as follows:

"The absence of any definite limitation upon the power of the incorporators to impose restrictions must be taken to be a legislative determination that considerable latitude was intended. No such restrictions can be declared to be unlawful under these circumstances unless palpably unreasonable. A corporation bears some resemblance to a partnership. Plainly no new partner can be introduced into a partnership without the assent of all the partners. Said Chief Justice Holmes in Barrett v. King, 181 Mass. 476, at page 479, when discussing a somewhat similar proposition: 'Stock in a corporation is not merely property. It also creates a personal relation analogous otherwise than technically to a partnership. * * * There seems to be no greater objection to retaining the right of choosing one's associates in a corporation than in a firm.' The motives for the retention of such right in a small business corporation, where substantial changes in ownership of stock well might be accompanied by a change of managing officers, are obvious. Subscriptions of stock sufficient to organize the corporation with adequate capital might be difficult to obtain unless permanency of management were secured in some way against possible changes arising from mutations in the ownership of a bare majority of the stock. Elements of importance both to the subscribers of capital stock and to the executive officers might render some such restriction a valuable security to the investment of money and to the personal devotion of individuals in building up the business. The characteristics of associated stockholders may be important. Harmony of purpose and of business methods and ideals among stockholders may be a significant element in success. The insertion of the restriction upon the right of transfer of the shares of stock in the agreement of association, the initial act in the organization of the company upon which depends all that comes after, is a limitation upon the corporation. It becomes a part of its being, and enters into each share of stock as a part of its essence. The corporation comes into existence with this inherent qualifying restraint. It is agreed to by all the original incorporators who in respect of determining the nature of the corporation speak for future stockholders. It must be approved by the commissioner of corporations as representative of the commonwealth before the charter can issue. A copy of it is a public record in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, where it may be read by all who contemplate becoming stockholders. * * * The owners of stock in a corporation thus organized cannot complain of such a congenital characteristic. Each stockholder takes his stock subject to this restraining condition. * * * That there is nothing inherently unconscionable in such a limitation upon the right of transfer is manifest from the very broad power exercised by organizers of companies under the English acts and in some of our states."

Mr. Thompson, in his work on Corporations (2d Ed.) vol. 4, § 4135, states the general law as follows:

"The rule is well settled that a provision in the charter or articles of incorporation that no stockholder shall sell and transfer his stock either without the consent of all other stockholders or that he will first offer it to the stockholders or to the corporation before selling to other persons is binding on persons who become owners of stock. These provisions, which really amount to agreements between stockholders themselves, are not invalid as against public policy, nor do they amount to an improper restraint of the power of alienation. There seems to be no objection to a corporation reserving to existing members the right to choose their associates. Such a provision justifies the refusal of the corporation to transfer the stock."

And this is supported by a number of authorities cited in the text. See, also, the following section 4136 and our own statutes (O. S. § 1114, subsec. 7, § 1128).

Counsel for appellant have called our attention to the decisions of this court rendered in Bridgers v. Bank, 152 N. C. 293, 67 S. E. 770, 81 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1199, and Sheppard v. Power Co., 150 N. C. 776, 64 S. E. 894, as tending to establish a contrary doctrine, but we do not think these cases are in point. The questions there presented dealt with the validity of voting trust agreements.

Probably it should also be observed that we are not now considering a case where the restrictions and limitations are contained only in a resolution or by-law of the corporation, and not in the provisions of its charter. In the case at bar, the limitations under consideration are contained in the defendant's charter, and they are also set out in its stock certificates. The corporation came into existence with this inherent, qualifying restraint as one of the rights and powers which it might exercise. It was agreed to by all the original incorporators, and the same was approved by the Secretary of State. The board of directors have acted in good faith, and we think the judgment of his honor, holding that such was permissible under the defendant's right of organization, must be upheld, in the absence of any allegation or proof of arbitrary, oppressive, or unreasonable conduct.

Affirmed.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  822(6)—Instruction as to promise of marriage not erroneous when considered as a whole.

In a prosecution for seduction, an instruction that the promise of marriage must be either expressed to prosecutrix or implied by defendant's acts and his relationship to her held not erroneous when considered in connection with the remainder of the charge.

2. Seduction  $\S$  45—Evidence supporting finding of seduction under marriage promise.

In a prosecution for seduction, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the seduction was accomplished by promise of marriage.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  1171(6) — Argument of prosecuting attorney held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for seduction, arguments of counsel for the prosecution relative to protecting the womanhood of the county against human vultures and wolves held not prejudicial.

4. Criminal law §919(3) — When new trial will be granted because of counsel's argument stated.

It is only when prosecuting counsel goes beyond the evidence in the case and makes charges against defendant which are not a reasonable and just inference from the evidence that the court will grant a new trial if the trial judge does not stop counsel and instruct the jury to disregard what he said.

Walker and Stacy, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Brunswick County; Kerr, Judge.

Thomas K. Meares was convicted of seduction, and he appeals. No error.

John D. Bellamy & Sons, of Wilmington, and C. Ed Taylor and Lorenzo Medlin, both of Southport, for appellant.

J. S. Neauming, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

OLARK, C. J. This appeal presents, we think, but two exceptions that require consideration.

The court, after instructing the jury fully and correctly as to the nature of the offense with which the defendant was charged and explaining to the jury the bill of indictment and instructing them as to the contentions of both the state and the defendant, and that before the defendant could be convicted the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that (1) the prosecuting witness was seduced by the defendant, and (2) that at the time of her seduction she was then and before that time had been an innocent and virtuous woman, added "that the state must also prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the seduction by the defendant was under a promise of marriage, either expressed or implied by the acts and conduct of the defendant," and said further, "and if the state had failed to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of either of these essential facts then the jury should acquit the defendant."

The court also told the jury that they could not convict the defendant upon the unsupported testimony of the prosecutrix, and further charged the jury:

"And so, gentlemen of the jury, are you satisfied from the evidence that the defendant seduced the prosecutrix, and at the time she was an innocent and virtuous woman, and that the seduction was induced by a promise upon the part of the defendant to marry her, either expressed to her or implied by his acts and his relationship to her? These facts, gentlemen of the jury, are to be determined by you from the evidence, and if you are so satisfied then you should find him guilty. If you are not so satisfied, gentlemen of the jury, then you should return the verdict of not guilty. If the prosecuting witness willingly surrendered her chastity, prompted by her own lustful passion, or by any other motive than that produced by a promise of marriage, then the court charges you that the defendant would not be guilty, and you should acquit him."

The court further charged the jury:

"The burden of proof is upon the state of North Carolina to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, and it must satisfy you of the criminal act, and it must satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that the prosecuting witness, Etta Beck, was seduced by the defendant, that at the time of her seduction she was an innocent and virtuous woman, and that the seduction was made under a promise of marriage, and, unless the state has so satisfied you, you should return a verdict of not guilty. If the state has so satisfied you beyond a reasonable doubt of the three essential elements that I have explained to you that constitutes the crime, then you should return a verdict of guilty."

[1] The jury found that there was no reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty. The charge was very full and complete and carefully expressed. The defendant excepts to the paragraphs above set out in quotation, because the court charged that the promise must be either "expressed to her or implied by his acts and his relationship to her." But it will be seen by reading all the charge bearing upon that point that the court throughout instructed the jury that they could not convict unless they were satisfied beyond a doubt of the three essential matters, (1) that the defendant seduced Etta Beck, (2) that she was and had been an innocent and virtuous woman, and that (3) the seduction was procured upon a promise by the defendant to marry her, but that, "if the prosecuting witness willingly surrendered her chastity prompted by her own lustful passion or for any other motive than that produced by promise of marriage, then the court charges you that the defendant would not be guilty and you should acquit him."

[2] The evidence on the part of the state, if believed by the jury, was amply sufficient to satisfy them beyond a reasonable doubt that the seduction was procured by such promise of marriage. The prosecuting witness testified unequivocally to the promise of marriage and that it was the sole inducement which procured her seduction; that he had been going with her since she was 16 years old and that they were engaged then; that in 1918 he joined the navy, and while in service of the government she received letters from him every week; that on his return he came to see her and renewed his promise of marriage, and that she told her mother that they were engaged, and her mother and sister both testified that the defendant told them that he was engaged to marry the prosecutrix. The court properly charged that they could not convict the defendant unless they believed the corroborating evidence.

The prosecuting witness also testified that, when she discovered that she was to become a mother, she told the defendant, who said that it would be all right; that he would marry her the next week; this promise he put off from time to time, and finally left in October and went to Mullins, S. C., but wrote her that he would meet her in the city of Wilmington at a time named, but did not do so; that while there he wrote and asked her to destroy all his letters that she had received from him. It was also in evidence that while in Mullins he wrote to a witness in Wilmington telling him to inform the prosecutrix that he was in Galveston, Tex., and not to let her know where he was. The evidence was very full and complete, and its credibility was for the jury.

It will be seen that the court instructed the jury fully and completely that unless they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the sole inducement to the seduction was the promise of marriage and "induced by no other motive" to acquit. The words "promise expressed or implied by the acts and conduct of the defendant," which is the sole ground of this exception, would be harmless, as there was evidence, corroborated by the mother and sister, of the promise of marriage, but, if it were otherwise, the language of the judge, taken with the repeated instruction that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the seduction was procured "by the inducement of a promise of marriage and no other motive," could have no other meaning than that there was an expressed promise or such acts and conduct on the part of the defendant that was unequivocal and would satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that such acts and conduct were the full equivalent of an express promise, and not a mere inference which the prosecuting witness might draw. "Acts speak louder than words," and the conduct of the defendant which might amount to an implied promise must have been such under the charge of the judge that it would convince the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that such promise was the sole inducement which procured the seduction. The jury were not misled by the charge of the judge, which was explicit that there must have been a "promise," and that, whether expressed or implied by his acts, such promise was the sole inducement which caused the seduction.

In State v. Ring, 142 N. C. 599, 55 S. E. 195, 115 Am. St. Rep. 759, it was said by Walker, J.:

"It is not necessary to a conviction under this law that the state should show that the defendant directly and expressly promised the prosecutrix to marry her if she would submit to his embraces. It is quite sufficient if the jury from the evidence can fairly infer that the seduction was accomplished by reason of the promise, giving to the defendant the benefit of any reasonable doubt."

In State v. Raynor, 145 N. C. 475, 59 S. E. 345, it is said, quoting State v. Ring, supra:

"Such conduct is the legal equivalent of an express promise to marry if she would submit to his lecherous solicitations, provided the jury found, as they did, that it had the effect of alluring her from the path of virtue."

In State v. Malonee, 154 N. C. 203, 69 S. E. 786, it is again said by Walker, J.:

"We said in State v. Ring, supra, that it is sufficient if the jury can fairly infer from the evidence that the seduction was accomplished by reason of the promise of marriage, giving to the defendant the benefit of any reasonable doubt, and that no set form of words is necessary to show the causal relation between the promise and the act of sexual intercourse."

In State v. Fulcher, 176 N. C. 727, 97 S. E. 8, it is said:

"As to the seduction by reason of the promise, the defendant admitted the engagement to other witnesses, and his assiduous attentions to the girl at the time when she alleged they committed the act, with other circumstances already related, tended to support her testimony that he had promised to marry her, and she was thereby persuaded, after hesitation, to yield to his wishes. The woman could not easily be supported in any other way, for the man is not apt to admit his own guilt, though there are witnesses of it. State v. Pace, supra; State v. Whitley, 141 N. C. 823; State v. Kincaid, 142 N. C. 657; State v. Moody, 172 N. C. 967. It is said in Underhill on Cr. Evidence, § 388: 'The conduct and relations of the parties after, as well as before, the date of the alleged seduction may be shown, such evidence being relevant to prove that consent was obtained by promise and inducements, and of what they consisted.' This is cited with approval in State v. Moody, 172 N. C. 971."

In State v. Cooke, 176 N. C. 735, 97 S. E. 172, it was said:

"There was unqualified evidence of the promise of marriage, though in State v. Ring, 142 N. C. 596, it was held that it was sufficient if this could be reasonably inferred from the evidence; there was evidence of the good character of the girl, which was held sufficient supporting testimony in State v. Horton, 100 N. C. 448, and State v. Malonee, 154 N. C. 202; there was evidence that she told her mother and father of the engagement and the conduct of the defendant, which was held sufficient as supporting testimony in State v. Moody, 172 N. C. 967, and numerous cases there cited by Walker, J., from this and other states. The testimony of the mother that the daughter told her of her engagement and of the conduct of the defendant was also held sufficient in State v. Whitley, 141 N. C. 823, and State v. Kincaid, 142 N. C. 657."

In 24 R. O. L. p. 746, the law is thus summed up as to the promise of marriage:

"In many states, though not in all, seduction is punishable as a crime only when accomplished under a promise of marriage. When such promise is a necessary element of the crime, it need not be shown that the defendant directly and expressly promised the prosecutrix to marry her if she would submit to his embraces, and it is sufficient if the jury, under the evidence, can fairly infer that the seduction was accomplished by reason of the promise, giving to the defendant the benefit of any reasonable doubt. But it must appear that the prosecutrix yielded her virtue in consequence of such promise, and not to gratify her curiosity or lustful passion."

The learned judge charged exactly in accord with the law as stated in the above extract and in our own cases above quoted.

One of the counsel for the prosecution in closing his speech to the jury said:

"The time has come when the decent people in North Carolina should stand up and defend the virtue and integrity of the fireside and home against the vicious assaults of human vultures and wolves."

He was interrupted by one of the counsel for the defendant, who asked the court to order the counsel to desist. The court refused to stop counsel in his argument, who then said:

"Regardless of what the counsel says, the Supreme Court has said, I propose to defend the womanhood of Brunswick county and the virtue of the prosecutrix in this case."

The court remarked that the counsel for the state was within his rights and the defendant excepted.

[3] We cannot see that the defendant was in any wise prejudiced by the statement of counsel for the prosecution. He was endeavoring to convince the jury that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged. In so arguing upon the evidence he was strictly within his rights, and in his generalization that those who committed such offenses were "human vultures and wolves" he certainly was not doing any prejudice to the defendant that would compare with his argument that upon the facts the jury should be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had committed that offense. It was to decide that question that the jury had been impaneled, and that this trial was had.

[4] It is only when counsel goes beyond the evidence in the case, and makes charges against the defendant which are not a reasonable and just inference from the evidence, that the court will grant a new trial if the presiding judge does not stop counsel and instruct the jury to disregard what he said. State v. Surles, 117 N. C. 724, 23 S. E. 324.

The prosecution could and did claim that this case was an effort on the part of the decent people of the state to stand up and defend the virtue and integrity of the fireside and the counsel were arguing that upon the evidence the defendant had been guilty of that offense. This is what the trial was to determine and counsel had the right to argue that the state had done so, according to the evidence. It was not error, therefore, for the learned judge to hold that the counsel was within his rights in stating that this offense was a most heinous one, and that the public was interested in its being punished. This was a generalization, indeed a truism, to which every one must agree. The statute makes it a felony. This court has said:

"There is no crime more despicable than this. It is committed in secret, by lust and lying, by deception and the stronger taking advantage of the weaker." State v. Cooke, 176 N. C. 735, 97 S. E. 171.

So far from the remark being prejudicial, it put the jury on guard as to the importance of the offense and was the statement of a legal and moral truth.

Upon consideration of all the exceptions we find no error.

WALKER and STACY, JJ., dissent.

BRADFORD v. BANK OF WARSAW. (No. 118.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Tenancy in common §15(4)—Seven years' possession under conveyance of entire interest from tenant in common insufficient as against cotenants or successor in interest.

Seven years' possession under conveyance of entire interest by a tenant in common held not sufficient to give possessor title to entire interest by adverse possession as against cotenants or their successor in interest under registered deed, 20 years' adverse possession being necessary in such case in view of C. S. § 430.

2. Tenancy in common §15(5)—Registered deeds of partition held not to give color of title as between persons claiming under the same source.

In partition action in which plaintiff and defendant claimed under a common source of title, partition deeds between heirs of common grantor held not to make defendant's possession under color of title, so as to acquire title by 7 years' adverse possession, where not registered until the trial.

3. Appeal and error §263(1)—Charge not excepted to not considered.

Assignment of error complaining of charge not excepted to will not be considered.

4. Tenancy in common §15(4)—Possession less than 20 years under registered deed of tenant in common insufficient as against cotenants.

A conveyance by one tenant in common, though duly registered, and continuous, open, notorious, and adverse possession for less than 20 years under such registered deed, would not bar the title of a cotenant.

5. Tenancy in common  $\Leftrightarrow$  15(4)—20 years' adverse and continuous possession will bar title of other cotenants where there has been an oral partition.

Where there is an oral partition, 20 years' adverse and continuous possession under conveyance of one cotenant will bar title of cotenant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Lyon, Judge.

Petition by N. E. Bradford against the Bank of Warsaw for sale for partition of lot. From judgment for petitioner, the defendant appeals. No error.

Stevens, Beasley & Stevens, of Warsaw, and Kenneth C. Royall, of Goldsboro, for appellant.

D. H. Bland, of Goldsboro, for appellee.

CLARK, O. J. The plaintiff and defendant claim under a common source of title, and the court so charged the jury, to which there was no exception. The defendant admits in its brief that Needham Kennedy was in possession of the land at the time of his death, and mentions his heirs by name. The plaintiff contends that he has shown a better title to the three-fifths interest in the land from this common source. Mobley v. Griffin, 104 N. C. 112, 10 S. E. 142. It is not denied that the defendant has a good title through the conveyances from the two daughters of their two-fifths interest in said lot.

The plaintiff put in evidence the deed to Needham Kennedy dated January 12, 1870, and registered in January, 1876, covering the property. It was in evidence that he died about 1905, leaving five children—Fannie Aldridge, Ida Darden, Bryant Kennedy, William Kennedy, and Levi Kennedy.

The plaintiff also put in evidence deeds to J. J. Ham from William Kennedy, Bryant Kennedy, and Levi Kennedy, each conveying their undivided interest in said lot, all of them dated July 14, 1916, and registered in Wayne August 24, 1916, and a conveyance from J. J. Ham to plaintiff covering the grantors' rights as conveyed in the three above deeds, dated October 17, and registered October 24, 1917. The plaintiff testified that the deeds covered the lot in question, and that there is no evidence that Needham Kennedy left a will nor that his widow is living.

The defendant offered in evidence a deed from Fannie Aldridge and husband to her sister Ida Darden, dated March 12, 1910, registered March 22, 1912, and also a deed from William Kennedy to Ida Darden January 24, 1910, registered April 12, 1921; and a mortgage March 21, 1910, from Ida Darden to Matthew Aldridge March 21, 1910, and registered the same day, and a deed dated May 10, 1912, from M. W. Aldridge, mortgagee, to A. J. Brown, registered June 11, 1912, and a deed dated March 27, 1915, from Daisy Brown and J. G. Brown and wife dated March 27, 1915, and registered May 1, 1916, all purporting to convey the entire interest. Said J. G. Brown and Daisy Brown were the only children of A. J. Brown, who died in 1913. Daisy Brown testified that the defendant bank of Warsaw had a mortgage on this property, and she and her brother made a deed to the bank in settlement of their father's debt.

The court charged the jury that it was agreed and admitted that both parties, the plaintiff and defendant derived their title from Needham Kennedy, who owned the land. The court also charged the jury in part:

"There has been something said about a parcel division of the land between the five children of Needham Kennedy. There has been no evidence in the opinion of the court offered to show that there has been a legal division of the land, and the partition deeds that have been offered were only registered here this week, but the deed from Ham to the plaintiff was registered soon after its execution. You will remember the date of the deed and the date of its registration. It is the first deed that goes on record that covers the title."

The defendant also set up a further defense that the plaintiff bought in the title of the three heirs under whom he claims while acting as agent for the bank in attempting to sell the land, and that, discovering what he supposed to be a defect in the title, he took a conveyance of the interests of the three heirs under whom he now claims. On this point the court charged the jury:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff here bought this land from Ham, and that Ham bought it from William, Bryant, and Levi, and that at the time the plaintiff took his deed from Ham he was not the agent of the defendant bank of Warsaw, and was not acting for them—that they had repudiated the contract of purchase when the deed was made to him, and if you shall find that the deeds were made to Ham by these three parties and their wives, and registered at the time the evidence tends to show that they were registered, the court charges you that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover whatever interest in this land these three parties—William, Bryant, and Levi—had, and the court charges you that, there being only five children, they own three-fifths of the land. The court charges you that, if he was the agent of the bank of Warsaw for getting the title, then the title would go to the bank of Warsaw, but if you find that he was not its agent at the time you will answer the issue two-fifths or three-fifths, whatever you find it to be."

To both of the above instructions the defendant excepted. There was voluminous evidence as to the alleged agency on both sides, and the plaintiff testified to the rupture of the agency and the severance of a connection between them prior to the time that Ham acquired the title under which he claims.

The defendant also excepted that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that during the year 1910 Ida Darden received a deed to the premises in fee simple from Matthew Aldridge, and that the same was recorded in March, 1912; and if you still further believe from the evidence that the said Ida Darden executed a mortgage on the premises to Matthew Aldridge, and that the said mortgage was duly recorded in March, 1910; and that in May, 1912, the said Aldridge foreclosed and sold said property to A. J. Brown by deed duly recorded in June, 1912; and that in March, 1915, his heirs conveyed said premises to the bank of Warsaw by deed recorded in May, 1916; and if you further believe that the said Ida Darden, the said A. J. Brown, and said J. G. Brown and Daisy Brown, and the said bank of Warsaw possessed the said property, either themselves, or by their agents, under said deeds and conveyances for a period of more than 7 years before the commencement of this action, and that the said possession was open, notorious, continuous, adverse, and under claim or right of color of title—then it would be your duty to answer the issue, 'No.'"

[1] This prayer for instruction was properly refused. The defendant claims under a mortgage recorded in March, 1910, and a deed on foreclosure thereof to A. J. Brown recorded in June, 1912, and under the deed to the defendant recorded in May, 1916. These were at most merely color of title, and there was not 7 years' possession thereunder prior to the conveyance registered in 1916 of the true title under which the plaintiff claims the three-fifths interest. It has been held in all our cases, from Cloud v. Webb, 14 N. C. 317, down to Gill v. Porter, 178 N. C. 451, 97 S. E. 831, that 20 years' adverse possession is required to vest the title between tenants in common. See cases collected under C. S. § 430. And the same is true where one tenant in common attempts to convey the whole estate. Alexander v. Cedar Works, 177 N. C. 137, 98 S. E. 312.

[2] The defendant put in evidence certain deeds of partition which were not registered until the trial. As to these deeds it is sufficient to quote from Buchanan v. Hadden, 169 N. C. 224, 85 S. E. 417.

"The defendants did not contend that they had been in adverse possession long enough to ripen their title without color, and as the deed under which they claimed title was not registered, and as both parties derived title from the same source, there was no color of title. Janney v. Robbins, 141 N. C. 406; Gore v. McPherson, 161 N. C. 638; King v. MacRackan, 168 N. C. 621."

The headnote to that case sums up the proposition correctly thus:

"An unregistered deed is not color of title when the parties to an action for the recovery of land are claiming under the same source."

The only request to charge was, as above set out, that the defendant, claiming title under a possession beginning with the mortgage in 1910 by one tenant in common for 7 years, had acquired title to the entire tract, which was refused.

[3] The defendant made no exception to the charge that there was "no evidence offered to show that there has been a legal division of the land," and hence the assignment of error on that ground, if there were anything in it, is not before us. The entire defense was stated in the refused prayer except the issue as to the plaintiff being estopped by his alleged agency from the defendant "to cure its defect in title," which the jury negatived.

The defendant's sole claim of title is a conveyance by one of the daughters of her "interest" for $75 to her sister in 1910, and a later mortgage by the other daughter alleged to cover the entire tract (though the deed was not set out) and an alleged possession thereunder for 7 years under a conveyance to the purchaser under that mortgage, and under another mortgage by said purchaser to the defendant bank, and the release by the mortgagor to said bank, and collection of rents thereunder as a substitute for actual possession. This was certainly not good under our uniform decisions requiring not less than 20 years' possession under a registered deed from one tenant in common (or his grantee) as against the conveyance of the title by the other three tenants in common of their three-fifths to the plaintiff registered in 1916.

The tract in question is a lot in "Negro Town," a suburb of Goldsboro 42 feet by 210 feet, which was hardly capable of actual partition, and no adverse possession against the other three tenants in common (who were residing in another state) is shown by residence thereon of one tenant in common in 1910 and by a mortgage from her and payment of rent after foreclosure to the defendant bank.

[4] A conveyance by one tenant in common, though duly registered, and continuous, open, notorious, and adverse possession for less than 20 years under such registered deed, would not bar the title of the other tenants. Certainly, therefore, the alleged oral conveyance by an oral partition (which the judge charged was not shown and the defendant did not except) and possession beginning with a mortgage by one tenant, even though it might cover the whole tract, for 7 years cannot bar the other tenants and the plaintiff claiming under registered deed from them.

It would be an anomaly indeed if an alleged oral partition and the residence by one tenant in common on said lot and a chain of mortgages and the payment of rent to the defendant under a possession for 7 years—not even shown to be adverse—should give title to the defendant when nothing less than 20 years' adverse possession would confer title, even under a registered deed, as against the other tenants and their grantee holding under a duly registered conveyance of their interest.

[5] Where there is an oral partition 20 years' possession, adverse and continuous, will bar Rhea v. Craig, 141 N. C. 602, 54 S. E. 408, 8 Ann. Cas. 400, cited and approved in Collier v. Paper Corporation, 172 N. C. 74, 89 S. E. 1006. This last case affirmed the ruling of Stacey, J., in the court below. In Gilchrist v. Middleton, 107 N. C. 681, 12 S. E. 85, it is said:

"The sole reception of the profits of land by one tenant in common is not an ouster, and will raise no presumption of an ouster against his fellows until he has enjoyed the exclusive profits of such rents for 20 years, and the grantee of a tenant in common, though he may hold possession under a deed purporting to convey the whole, stands, in this respect, precisely in the position of his grantor. Linker v. Benson, 67 N. C. 150; Caldwell v. Neely, 81 N. C. 114; Page v. Branch, 97 N. C. 97."

This has been cited since with approval in many cases, among them Hilton v. Gordon, 177 N. C. 344, 99 S. E. 5.

Upon full consideration of all the exceptions we find no error.

HOKE, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the present disposition made of defendant's appeal. This, a proceeding in partition, is, in effect, an action to recover three-fifths interest in a lot in the city of Goldsboro under deeds from three of the children and heirs at law of Needham Kennedy, deceased, Bryant, Levi, and William, duly proven and registered in Wayne county in July and August, 1916; the two other children and heirs at law being Fannie, wife of Matthew Aldridge, and Ida, wife of John Darden.

The action was instituted and the summons in the cause bears date March 15, 1920, and defendant resists a recovery on allegations with evidence tending to show: That at the time plaintiff acquired his deeds from these three Kennedy children he was in charge and control of the property as agent of the defendant, and the title relied on by him was obtained in fraud of defendant's rights and in breach of plaintiff's trust and duties as agent; second, that defendant and those under whom it claims have been in the open, exclusive, adverse, and continuous possession of said property asserting title thereto for more than seven years next before action brought.

The allegation and issue as to plaintiff's agency and breach of trust was submitted to the jury and resolved against the defendant.

On the position as to title by adverse possession, the court in effect ruled that on the entire evidence a 7 years' adverse possession was insufficient to mature title in defendant, but that 20 years is required for the purpose, to which ruling defendant excepted. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. On defendant's exception as to the statute of limitations, the facts in evidence permit the inference if they do not require the finding:

"That Needham Kennedy died in 1898, owner and in possession of certain property, including that in dispute. He was survived by five children, Ida Darden, Fannie Aldridge, Levi Kennedy, Bryant Kennedy, and William Kennedy, and by a widow (the stepmother of the children) who died in 1908. After the death of the widow the children made arrangements for the division of the property, whereby William and Bryant (who lived in New Jersey) were to receive money, and Ida, Fannie, and Levi were to divide the property, Ida to get the lot now in controversy (designated A) and Fannie and Levi to get other lots (designated B and C respectively).

"Accordingly, on June 17, 1909, Bryant conveyed A to Ida in fee; on January 24, 1910, William also conveyed A to Ida in fee; and during 1910, Levi conveyed A to Ida in fee; the deeds from Bryant and William were probated and delivered on the dates named, but were not recorded until April 12, 1921. The deed from Levi was lost, and never recorded. The arrangement was completed on March 21, 1910 in the office of Col. A. C. Davis, an attorney and notary, by the exchange of the following deeds for the following property: From Fannie Aldridge and husband, Matthew Aldridge, to Ida Darden for A; from Fannie and Matthew Aldridge to Levi Kennedy for C; and from Levi Kennedy and wife and Ida Darden and husband to Matthew Aldridge for B. The deeds to B and C were immediately probated. All three parties had gone into possession of their respective lots after the death of the widow; and they remained in possession. Levi later sold his lot.

"The deed for A from Fannie and husband to Ida was probated March 22, 1912. To secure a sum due him, Ida gave Matthew Aldridge a mortgage on A dated and recorded March 21, 1910. Ida received the rents from A from her stepmother's death until May 20, 1912. On that day Matthew sold the property under mortgage to Capt. A. J. Brown, the deed being recorded June 11, 1912.

"Capt. Brown, and after his death his heirs, received the rents of A from that date until March 27, 1915. On that day the Brown heirs conveyed the lot to Bank of Warsaw, the defendant, by deed recorded May 1, 1916. The bank has received the rent from the property from then until the present."

From these facts it appears:

That under a deed from Fannie Aldridge, made pursuant to the parol division of the estate, there has been continuous possession of the land in controversy, open, adverse, and in the assertion of ownership in Ida Darden and her grantees, including defendant, for eight years before this suit was entered.

Second, that Ida Darden, while in undisputed and exclusive possession, asserting title, executed a mortgage to Matthew Aldridge for the land in dispute, and the grantees of Aldridge possessed the land under the same for more than 7 years before suit was entered.

Third, that Matthew Aldridge, said grantee, pursuant to powers in the deed, conveyed the land in dispute to A. J. Brown, and Brown and his descendants and grantees, including defendant, possessed the same in assertion of ownership for more than 7 years before suit entered.

Fourth, it appears further that this occupation and possession in assertion of title by Ida Darden and her grantees under deeds purporting to convey the entire property in dispute was had in pursuance of a parol division of the real and personal property of Needham Kennedy in which the three grantors of plaintiff, children of Needham, took part, and that these three grantors as early as 1910 had executed to Ida Darden deeds for the land in controversy, two of them not being registered, however, until 1921, and the other lost, and it is under these and a similar deed from Fannie Aldridge, the other daughter, and her grantees, that the possession and occupation of the defendants has been continually maintained.

It is very generally held that in case of tenants in common an occupation in assertion of ownership and sole perception of the rents and profits will not of itself mature a title in the occupant as against his cotenants for any period short of 20 years. It is said that after that period of time an ouster of the cotenants will be presumed, but no shorter time will suffice. Adderholt v. Lowman, 179 N. C. 547, 103 S. E. 1; Dobbins v. Dobbins, 141 N. C. 210, 53 S. E. 870, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185, 115 Am. St. Rep. 682. And in this jurisdiction it has been insistently held that the position is not affected because the occupation of one of the tenants is under a deed purporting to convey the entire property, whether that deed is from one of the other cotenants or a stranger. Boggan v. Somers, 152 N. C. 390, 67 S. E. 965; Clary v. Hatton, 152 N. C. 107, 67 S. E. 258; Caldwell v. Neely, 81 N. C. 114; Covington v. Stewart, 77 N. C. 148; Cloud v. Webb, 14 N. C. 317.

As pointed out in Roper Lumber Co. v. Richmond Cedar Works, 165 N. C. 83, 80 S. E. 982, this position requiring 20 years' occupation by one tenant in common under a deed conveying the entire interest has been carried very much further in this state than elsewhere, our decisions holding that the title of a cotenant will not be destroyed by occupation for any period short of 20 years, though the claimant may have known that the occupant was asserting sole ownership under a deed purporting to convey the entire property. But the ruling is fully established here, and we have no disposition to question it.

In all of these decisions, however, the tenant in common, occupant of the property, was endeavoring to assert title against a cotenant who had in no way acquiesced in or recognized the occupant's claim of sole ownership, and none of them so far as examined would uphold the position on the facts presented in this record, where the claimants have joined in a division of the property awarding the sole ownership to the tenant in possession, and assuredly so where they have made deeds to such in recognition of the division as made.

The ruling involved in these North Carolina decisions, as shown, rests upon the position that an ouster will not be presumed against a tenant in common by mere occupation for any period short of 20 years, though such occupation is under color of title and to the knowledge of the claimant, but all the authorities here and elsewhere are to the effect that there may be an actual ouster of one tenant in common by another. Mott v. Land Co., 146 N. C. 525, 526, 60 S. E. 423, citing Covington v. Stewart, 77 N. C. 148; Tyler on Ejectment, p. 882. The test in such cases is whether the occupation of the tenant in possession asserting title has become hostile to cotenant, and both the reason of the thing and the authorities appertaining to the subject are to the effect that a conveyance of a grantor to a grantee and occupation in assertion of ownership under it will constitute a hostile holding. Kirkman v. Holland, 139 N. C. 185-189, 51 S. E. 856; Newton Academy v. Bank of Asheville, 101 N. C. 483, 8 S. E. 174. And it has been directly held that possession with assertion of ownership pursuant to a parol partition of land will amount to a disseizin, and the occupation will be considered as hostile to the title of the others taking part therein. Collier v. Paper Corporation, 172 N. C. 74, 89 S. E. 1006; Boston & Worcester R. R. v. Sparhawk et al., 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 469; Russell v. Tennant, 63 W. Va. 623, 60 S. E. 609, 129 Am. St. Rep. 1024; Justice et al. v. Lawson, 46 W. Va. 163, 33 S. E. 102.

True, in the North Carolina case referred to, the possession was for 20 years and more, but that was only relied on in view of the ruling that a parol partition acquiesced in and acted on for 20 years becomes valid, and it was fully recognized that it created at the inception a possession hostile to the parties concerned and all others.

The court below seems to have been influenced by the consideration that the deeds pertinent to the question were not registered till after those of plaintiff, and that the parol partition was invalid, and this is referred to in the principal opinion as a reason for the decision. But neither the deeds nor the partition are relied on or referred to as controlling the title, but the question here is, What effect should they be allowed on the nature of defendant's occupation—did they show that the possession of Ida Darden and those claiming under her was hostile to the plaintiff who has bought from the cotenants, and all of whom took part in the parol partition and have made deeds in recognition of the title of their sister under whose deed defendants claim and have had possession, asserting title for more than 7 years?

We are cited by counsel for appellees to Janney v. Robbins, 141 N. C. 406, 53 S. E. 863, and other cases to the effect that unregistered deed is not to be considered color of title as against a claimant under a registered deed from same source—under the restricted facts there appearing the cases so hold; but, as we have endeavored to show, defendant here is not relying on these unregistered deeds either for title or for color. Defendant has color both under the deed from Matthew Aldridge and wife and from the mortgagee deed—under which it claims, and the unregistered deed of the three tenants as stated and referred to, and relied on only as they may effect the character of defendant's possession, and as showing that his occupation and claim of ownership was of a hostile character—assured and acquiesced in by plaintiff grantors and so amounting to an ouster.

In my opinion, if the facts referred to and presented in the record are accepted by the jury, the defendant should be declared the sole owner, and for the error in refusing to submit this view of the case, there should be a new trial of the issue.

New trial.

TAYLOR et al. v. MEADOWS et al.
(No. 331.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

Trial ⇐244(5) — Instruction giving undue credit to testimony erroneous.

In boundary case, an instruction that, if from the calls in the deeds, the survey, and the surveyor's testimony explanatory thereof the jury was satisfied as to the proper location of the boundaries, it should render its verdict accordingly, without regard to oral testimony of other witnesses, was erroneous, as giving undue credit to the surveyor's testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Granville County; Horton, Judge.

Action by J. F. Meadows and others against R. P. Taylor and others in ejectment. The locus in quo is a small strip of land 30 feet wide by 161½ feet long, situated on the north side of Williamsboro street in the city of Oxford. From a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiffs, the defendants appealed. New trial ordered.

Hicks & Stein, Parham & Lassiter, and Royster & Royster, all of Oxford, and Hicks & Son, of Henderson, for appellants.

A. W. Graham & Son, of Oxford, A. L. Brooks, of Greensboro, and James A. Taylor and D. G. Brummitt, both of Oxford, for appellees.

STACY, J. The case at bar has been tried three times in the superior court and this is the third appeal here. Former opinions reported in 169 N. C. 124, 85 S. E. 1, and 175 N. C. 373, 95 S. E. 662. As desirable as an ending of this litigation would seem, we are unable to sustain the following portion of his honor's charge, which was given at the request of the plaintiffs, and to which the defendants have specifically excepted:

"That if from the calls in the deeds and the map of survey offered in evidence and the testimony of the surveyor explaining such survey, you are satisfied as to the proper location of the several lines bounding the land in dispute, then it would be your duty to act upon the same and render your verdict accordingly, without regard to the oral testimony offered by either side tending to show the proper location of the line or lines."

This instruction was erroneous because its effect was to give undue credit to the testimony of the surveyor. The plaintiffs were not entitled to have the court single out by name any one witness from among all the others who had testified to the same matter, and tell them that if they were satisfied from his evidence, taken in connection with the deeds and the map, they should render their verdict accordingly. This was in direct conflict with a number of our decisions. Cogdell v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 398, 40 S. E. 202; Jackson v. Com'rs, 76 N. C. 282; Anderson v. Steamboat Co., 64 N. C. 399. In Weisenfeld v. McLean, 96 N. C. 248, 2 S. E. 56, Davis, J., speaking for the court, said:

"It would be error to single out the testimony of one witness, when there are others testifying to the same matters, and charge the jury that if they believed that witness they must find in accordance with his testimony."

And this for the very good reason, among others, that though the witness may speak truthfully, yet his evidence is given in the light of other testimony which may tend to modify and explain it, and it would be improper to take it from its own setting. Willey v. Gatling, 70 N. C. 410.

There are other exceptions appearing on the record, worthy of consideration, but we apprehend they will not arise on another hearing.

For the error, as indicated, the cause must be tried again; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Husband and wife  $\Rightarrow$ 303—Statute against abandonment to be strictly construed, and not extended by implication.

C. S. § 4447, punishing willful abandonment of wife or children, being a penal statute, must be strictly construed, and the court cannot extend its terms by implication to include cases not clearly within its meaning.

2. Husband and wife  $\Rightarrow$ 313—One accused of abandonment presumed innocent.

One accused of abandonment of wife under C. S. § 4447, enters on trial with the common-law presumption of innocence in his favor, and, when the state has shown abandonment, the jury may infer it was intentional and without just cause.

3. Husband and wife  $\Rightarrow$ 313—Burden of proving adultery of wife justifying abandonment not on defendant.

In prosecution under C. S. § 4447, for abandonment of wife, defendant is not required to offer any evidence, and failure to do so is not to be taken against him; hence on the question of his wife's alleged infidelity the burden of proving the issue, as distinguished from the duty of going forward with the evidence, is not shifted to the defendant, but the burden is still with the state.

4. Criminal law  $\Rightarrow$ 823(9)—Instructions on burden of proof as to wife abandonment and as to justification therefor held misleading.

In prosecution under C. S. § 4447, for wife abandonment, instruction that, if abandonment was caused by infidelity of the wife or any just cause, the jury should acquit, and that "the burden being on defendant to satisfy you of the adultery of the wife not beyond reasonable doubt nor by the great weight of the evidence, but simply to your satisfaction," etc., was misleading and erroneous, though the court instructed that the burden was on the state to satisfy them from all the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant willfully abandoned his wife without providing adequate support.

5. Criminal law  $\Rightarrow$ 1172(4, 5)—Conflicting instructions ground for reversal.

Where there are conflicting instructions with respect to a material matter, new trial must be granted, as the jury are not supposed to know which one of the two states the law correctly, and the court on review cannot say that they did not follow the erroneous instruction.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Vance County; Cranmer, Judge.

David Falkner was convicted of willfully abandoning his wife without providing for her support, and appeals. New trial.

The prosecutrix and defendant were married June 2, 1918. The defendant enlisted in the navy three days later, and while stationed in Norfolk, Va., his wife spent some time with him there. He was discharged in January, 1919, and returned to his home in Henderson, where he lived with his wife until July, 1920. Defendant testified that he left the prosecutrix on account of her infidelity and because she had infected him with a venereal disease. There are no living children of the marriage. Upon the question of the wife's adultery the evidence was conflicting.

The defendant's principal exception is directed to the following portion of his honor's charge, dealing with the burden of proof:

"If you shall find the defendant abandoned his wife without providing adequate support for her, and that such abandonment and failure were provoked and caused by the infidelity of the wife of the defendant, or for any just cause he had abandoned his wife, then in either case you would acquit the defendant.

"The burden being upon the defendant to satisfy you of the adultery of the wife, not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by the greater weight of the evidence, but simply to your satisfaction, you will consider and pass upon all the evidence in the case in making up your verdict, and determine what weight you will give to it."

The court subsequently charged the jury as stated in the record:

"That the burden was on the state to satisfy them from all the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant willfully abandoned his wife without providing adequate support for her, and that, if they were so satisfied, they would find defendant guilty, but, if they were not so satisfied, they would find the defendant not guilty."

There was a verdict of guilty; and from a judgment of 18 months on the roads pronounced thereon, the defendant appealed.

J. H. Bridgers, of Henderson, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

STACY, J. Section 4447 of the Consolidated Statutes, under which the defendant is indicted, provides as follows:

[1, 2] It will be observed that a willful abandonment is the conduct which is condemned by this enactment of the Legislature. Being a penal statute, we must apply the rule of strict construction, and we are not at liberty to extent its terms, by implication, to include cases not clearly within its meaning. State v. Colonial Club, 154 N. C. 177, 69 S. E. 771, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 387, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1079; State v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 1052, 30 S. E. 133, 41 L. R. A. 246. Willfulness is an essential element of the crime, and this must be found by the jury. The issue, upon an indictment for a violation of the present law, is the alleged guilt of the defendant. He enters on the trial with the common-law presumption of innocence in his favor. When the state has shown an abandonment and the defendant's failure to provide adequate support, the jury may infer from these facts, together with the attendant circumstances, and they would be warranted in finding, if they are so satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, that it had been done intentionally, without just cause or legal excuse—I. e., willfully. State v. Taylor, 175 N. C. 833, 96 S. E. 22.

The position just stated has been approved by us in a number of carefully considered decisions.

"The abandonment must be willful; that is, without just cause or excuse; unjustifiable and wrongful." State v. Smith, 164 N. C. 475, 79 S. E. 979.

Again, in State v. Morgan, 136 N. C. 628, 48 S. E. 670, Mr. Justice Walker, speaking for a unanimous court says:

"If the act may be innocent or not according to the intent with which it is done, or if its criminality depends upon the intent, it is incumbent on the state to show the intent or to show the facts and circumstances from which the intent may be inferred by the jury, and it is necessary that the jury should find the intent as a fact before the defendant charged with the commission of the act can be adjudged guilty of a crime"—citing State v. McDonald, 133 N. C. 680, 45 S. E. 582.

Unless the willfulness of the defendant's conduct is established, the offense is not made out; and this is a question of fact for the jury, under all the evidence, and not for the court. State v. King, 86 N. C. 603; State v. Wolf, 122 N. C. 1079, 29 S. E. 841; State v. Martin, 141 N. C. 832, 53 S. E. 874.

In this connection it may be well to observe that the next section (C. S. § 4448), dealing with what shall be deemed presumptive evidence of a willful abandonment, requires the showing of something more than a mere separation and failure to provide adequate support. These circumstances having been established, "then the fact that such husband neglects applying himself to some honest calling for the support of himself and family, and is found sauntering about, endeavoring to maintain himself by gaming or other undue means, or is a common frequenter of drinking houses, or is a known common drunkard, shall be presumptive evidence that such abandonment and neglect is willful." Thus it would appear that the Legislature selected the words of the statute under which the defendant is indicted with studied care and deliberation and with a full appreciation of their meaning.

[3] The defendant is not required to offer any evidence, and his failure to do so is not to be taken against him. State v. Smith, supra. Hence upon the question of his wife's alleged infidelity or unfaithfulness the burden of proving the issue, as distinguished from the duty of going forward with the evidence, is not shifted to the defendant. He may put the question of her chastity in issue, by cross-examination or otherwise, but this does not reverse the position of himself and that of his wife and make him the prosecutor and his wife the defendant. She is not on trial. The burden is still with the state, under all the evidence, to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt. State v. Woody, 47 N. C. 276; State v. Willbourne, 87 N. C. 529; State v. Hopkins, 130 N. C. 647, 40 S. E. 973; State v. Connor, 142 N. C. 700, 55 S. E. 787; State v. Leeper, 146 N. C. 655, 61 S. E. 585; and State v. A. C. L. R. Co., 149 N. C. 470, 62 S. E. 755.

It is sometimes said that the burden of producing evidence rests upon the party best able to sustain it, because of facts and circumstances peculiarly within his knowledge. Thus it was held in Farrall v. State, 32 Ala. 557, that, the existence of a license being a fact peculiarly within the knowledge of the party accused, it was incumbent upon him to show the license, even though the nonexistence thereof was the gravamen of the offense charged. To like effect, and for the same reason, are our own decisions. State v. Morrison, 14 N. C. 299; State v. Smith, 117 N. C. 809, 23 S. E. 449; State v. Emery, 98 N. C. 670, 3 S. E. 636; State v. Glenn, 118 N. C. 1194, 23 S. E. 1004; State v. Holmes, 120 N. C. 576, 26 S. E. 692. But in the instant case the alleged adultery of the defendant's wife is not a fact peculiarly within the defendant's own knowledge. Indeed, if this rule is to be invoked here, and we do not think it is, it might well be said that such is undoubtedly within the knowledge of the prosecutrix. At any rate, we hold that the raising of this question does not shift the burden of the issue to the defendant. Govan v. Cushing, 111 N. C. 458, 16 S. E. 619. On the other hand, in a case like the one at bar, where the husband is indicted for a willful abandonment and nonsupport, there is no presumption of law or of fact against the wife's virtue. She not being on trial, the matter is left at large, and it is an open question, just like any other question of fact, to be determined by the jury. Certainly there is no presumption that she has committed adultery, or that she has been unfaithful to her marriage vow.

The position here taken with respect to the burden of the issue, has been approved in a long line of decisions, and is nowhere better stated than by Ruffin, J., in State v. Wilbourne, 87 N. C. 529, as follows:

"The general rule most undoubtedly is that the truth of every averment, whether it be affirmative or negative, which is necessary to constitute the offense charged, must be established by the prosecutor. The rule itself is but another form of stating the proposition that every man charged with a criminal violation of the law is presumed to be innocent until shown to be guilty, and it is founded, it is said, upon principles of natural justice; and so forcibly has it commended itself by its wisdom and humanity to the consideration of this court that it has never felt willing, whatever circumstances of difficulty might attend any given case, to disregard it."

Of course, where an abandonment and nonsupport are both established or admitted, it may be necessary for the defendant to come forward with his evidence and proof, or else run the risk of an adverse verdict. But where there is no opposite presumption, sufficient to overcome the presumption of innocence, the most that can be required of him, under our system of jurisprudence, is explanation, not exculpation. The defendant is not required to show his innocence. The state must establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and the burden of this ultimate issue never shifts. The laboring oar upon the question of guilt is constantly with the prosecution. State v. Wilkerson, 164 N. C. 432, 79 S. E. 888.

In Shepard v. Tel. Co., 143 N. C. 244, 55 S. E. 704, 118 Am. St. Rep. 796, the present Chief Justice, speaking for a unanimous court, states the rule as follows:

"In criminal cases, when a homicide with a deadly weapon is proved or admitted, there is a presumption of law that the killing is murder, and the burden is on the prisoner to prove all matter in mitigation or excuse to the satisfaction of the jury (State v. Matthews, 142 N. C. 621); and when a totally independent defense is set up, as insanity, which is really another issue (State v. Haywood, 94 N. C. 847), the burden of that issue is on the prisoner. But the burden of the issue as to the guilt of the prisoner, except where the law raises a presumption of law as distinguished from a presumption of fact, remains on the state throughout, and, when evidence is offered to rebut the presumption of fact raised by the evidence, the burden is still on the state to satisfy the jury of the guilt of the prisoner upon the whole evidence. Notably, when the prisoner offers proof of an alibi, for example, which goes to the proof of the act. State v. Josey, 64 N. C. 56."

This case has been approved in a number of later decisions. See Cox v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 117, 62 S. E. 884, Winslow v. Hdw. Co., 147 N. C. 275, 60 S. E. 1130, and Shepard's N. C. Citations.

"The rule as to the burden of proof is important and indispensable in the administration of justice, and constitutes a substantial right of the party upon whose adversary the burden rests. It should therefore be jealously guarded and rigidly enforced by the courts." 22 C. J. 69; Hughes v. Railroad Co., 85 N. J. Law, 212, 89 Atl. 769, L. R. A. 1916A, 927; Wigmore on Evidence, § 2483 et seq.

The case of State v. Schweitzer, 57 Conn. 532, 18 Atl. 787, 6 L. R. A. 125, while apparently an opposite persuasive authority in support of his honor's charge, must be read in connection with the Connecticut statute which in terms is different from ours. Section 6416, General Statutes of Connecticut, provides:

"Every person who shall unlawfully neglect or refuse to support his wife or children shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a felony and shall be imprisoned not more than one year, unless he shall show to the court before which the trial is had that, owing to physical incapacity or other good cause, he is unable to furnish such support," etc.

It will be noted that the word "unlawfully" is used in the Connecticut statute, while in ours the word "willfully" is employed. An unlawful act is not necessarily willful. State v. Morgan, 136 N. C. 628, 48 S. E. 670.

"The word 'willful,' used in a statute creating a criminal offense, means something more than an intention to do a thing. It implies the doing the act purposely and deliberately, indicating a purpose to do it, without authority—careless whether he has the right or not—in violation of law, and it is this which makes the criminal intent, without which one cannot be brought within the meaning of a criminal statute." State v. Whitener, 93 N. C. 590.

The term "unlawfully" implies that an act is done or not done, as the law allows or requires; while the term "willfully" implies that the act is done knowingly and of stubborn purpose. State v. Massey, 97 N. C. 465, 2 S. E. 445. Schweitzer's Case is thus distinguishable from the one at bar, for under the Connecticut statute the state is not required to show a willful neglect in order to make out its case; while with us such is a prerequisite according to the express terms of the statute.

The case of State v. Hopkins, 130 N. C. 647, 40 S. E. 973, must be overruled if his honor's charge in the instant case is to be upheld; and this would carry with it a reversal of State v. Smith, 164 N. C. 475, 79 S. E. 979, and State v. Taylor, 175 N. C. 833, 96 S. E. 22. But it is said that in these cases the court, by "judicial legislation" has ingrafted something into the statute without authority and contrary to the expressed intention of the Legislature. It is even suggested that adultery on a part of the wife is no excuse for the husband's abandonment and failure to provide for her support. Though we have declared otherwise it is said in criticism that these decisions belong to another day and to another age, and that we should now advance from such a "barbarism." After mature reflection and earnest consideration, we are unwilling to overrule these cases. We think they correctly state the law on the subject of the burden of proof as it obtains in this jurisdiction. The decision in State v. Hopkins was rendered nearly 20 years ago, and the numerous Legislatures which have assembled since that time have not seen fit to amend or to make any change in the present statute. That a husband may not be convicted for abandoning an adulterous or unfaithful wife is a position so well fortified by every reasonable consideration and by the force of its own righteousness as to meet with the approval of the common judgment of men. To argue otherwise is but to complain at the standard of human conduct, established in accordance with the eternal fitness of things and in keeping with the everlasting verities. So far as our investigation discloses, no court has ever held to the contrary; and we are confident that our present construction is entirely permissible, and we think entirely correct, under the use of the words in the statute of "willfully abandon."

It may not be amiss to remark that the defendant is not to be released or discharged; he is to be tried again. Furthermore, his wife is not without the civil remedies which are vouchsafed to her by the law. See C. S. § 1667, and cases cited thereunder.

[4, 5] Upon a careful perusal of the record, we think the charge as applied to the defendant was misleading in its effect; and, while the court's general charge in other sections placed the burden of proof upon the state in proper form, yet this specific instruction with respect to the wife's alleged adultery was calculated to mislead, and in all probability did mislead, the jury. State v. Morgan, 136 N. C. 628, 48 S. E. 670. It is well settled that, where there are conflicting instructions, with respect to a material matter, a new trial must be granted, as the jury are not supposed to know which one of the two states the law correctly, and we cannot say they did not follow the erroneous instruction. Edwards v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 99, 43 S. E. 585; Williams v. Hard, 118 N. C. 481, 24 S. E. 217; Tillett v. Railroad, 115 N. C. 662, 20 S. E. 480.

The evidence offered by the defendant was in reply to the necessary allegation that his conduct had been willful, but the law does not cast upon him the burden of disproving the criminal intent. This is a fact which the state must establish, not only to the satisfaction of the jury, but beyond a reasonable doubt, before a verdict of guilty can be rendered against him. The instruction of his honor was equivalent to saying that, upon the question of intent, the burden was on the defendant to satisfy the jury that he had not acted willfully. It is true the instruction related to a specific fact, to wit, the alleged adultery of the wife; but this circumstance, and all the testimony bearing upon it, was competent only on the question of intent. In no other view was the evidence material and relevant.

For the error in the charge, as indicated, in placing too heavy a burden on the defendant, we are of opinion that the cause must be submitted to another jury; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The defendant is indicted under C. S. § 4447, which provides:

There is no proviso or exception in the statute.

The defendant testified that he had left his wife and defiantly added that he had not contributed to her support, and does not intend to do so, nor to live with her. His contention is that, though he has abandoned his wife and is not giving her any support—which are the acts which the statute makes a misdemeanor—he cannot be convicted unless his wife shall show beyond a reasonable doubt that he has no excuse for doing so, and that the burden is on her to show beyond a reasonable doubt that she has not committed adultery or done any other act which would justify him in procuring a divorce from her. Such a proposition is not authorized by the statute, and cannot be sustained in reason or by precedent, save in an obiter expression in State v. Hopkins, 130 N. C. at page 649, 40 S. E. 973, and some cases based thereon.

If the wife has done anything which will justify releasing the defendant from the marriage, the burden is on him to bring such action and by preponderance of proof to satisfy the jury of the truth of his allegations, and even that will not release him from the obligation under this statute to support his innocent children, for in State v. Kerby, 110 N. C. 558, 14 S. E. 856, it is held that—

"The failure by the father to provide for the support of the children is as much a violation of the statute * * * as the failure to provide support for the wife."

And, while a divorce would release him from liability for her support, it would not relieve him of the moral and legal obligation to support his children.

The contention of the defendant that, notwithstanding he is proven or admits (as in this case) that he has abandoned his wife and does not support her, she is presumed beyond a reasonable doubt to be guilty of adultery or some other cause that will justify him in such conduct, and that the burden is upon her to show to the contrary beyond a reasonable doubt, if it were well founded, would simply relieve him of the expense and burden of proof in proving her misconduct in an action to sever the marriage tie, and that, if she fails to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he is not entitled to a divorce, he is discharged from such liability as fully as if there had been a divorce granted. This turns this proceeding practically into an action for divorce, but throws the burden of proof upon the wife.

The whole case therefore turns upon an inadvertent construction placed upon the word "willful" in State v. Hopkins, 130 N. C. 649, 40 S. E. 974, which says that willful means "without a cause to justify him in doing so." This certainly cannot be sustained by anything in the statute, and is contrary to every definition of the word in all the dictionaries and is unjust, for it puts upon the woman the burden of disproving everything that the plaintiff is required to prove in bringing an action for divorce. A reference to that case will show that it was, as the judge said, "a remarkable case," but not in the sense that the writer of that opinion intended (which was by a divided court), which was more a criticism of the trial judge than a decision of the case upon the merits as a matter of law. The statement therein that the trial judge had made the case "a trial of the wife for adultery" was the very thing which that opinion requires, for, if followed, it will make every trial for abandonment primarily a trial for divorce, the entire burden being thrown, contrary to law, upon the wife to disprove the charge of any and all conceivable misconduct.

The word "willful" is defined in Webster's International Dictionary as "voluntary; intentional; purposely." In almost the same words is the definition given by the Century, Worcester, Standard, Funk & Wagnall, and all the other dictionaries. It is the simple adjective of the plain Anglo-Saxon word "will," which all men understand, and which is not dependent upon whether an act is excusable or not. It is "willful" if done purposely and intentionally. On reference to 4 Words and Phrases, Second Series, in the multitude of cases defining the word "willful" set out in pages 1293-1310 there is no such definition given to the word "willful" as meaning "without cause to justify him in so doing," as was held in State v. Hopkins, as to any case of abandonment, and only three or four cases use it as to other matters, and then only by reason of additional words which do not appear in our abandonment statute.

With that exception all the cases collected in Words and Phrases supra from all the states define the word "willful" just as it is defined in all dictionaries, as an act done "intentionally," "by design," "with set purpose," etc. They all hold that "willful" means "intentionally, and not accidentally," and in some cases that it means "with deliberation or design or knowingly," and "not negligently"; that it means "purposely."

The obiter expression in State v. Hopkins imported into the word "willful" of "being without cause" a meaning that it has never borne in the courts or in the dictionaries, or in common parlance, and is in effect judicial legislation amending the statute to mean what the Legislature did not intend for it to mean, and raises a presumption unknown elsewhere in the decisions of any court in any other state or country, that when a man is charged with willful failure to discharge his duty to support his wife and children which he owes under the laws of God and man, there is a presumption beyond a reasonable doubt that his wife was guilty of adultery or some other grievous offense that would justify him in leaving her, which is equivalent to turning the trial into an action of divorce for adultery, or any other ground, with the burden upon the wife, and not upon the man, and that even in this case, though the defendant has admitted that he had done the act which the statute makes a misdemeanor, the judge must tell the jury that they cannot find the defendant guilty unless the wife has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that she has not committed adultery or any other act that would justify him in leaving her and the children without support.

There are cases in which the statute used other words in addition to the word "willful," or sets up provisos which would withdraw the case from the operation of the statute or make an exception or a defense. In those cases it has been held that the burden of the defense is upon the defendant, but it need only be proven to the satisfaction of the jury, and not beyond a reasonable doubt, and that unless on the whole case the jury is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt they should acquit.

Those precedents cannot in reason apply to this statute, which prescribes only two things to make the defendant guilty, and that is the willful abandonment of his wife without providing for her adequate support, and in this case both these facts were defiantly admitted by the defendant. There is no proviso nor exception nor defense in this statute.

As long as the marriage relation subsists, the burden is upon the defendant to support his wife. He cannot without procuring a divorce decide in his own behalf, without judge or jury, that he is entitled to a divorce and walk off without making any provision for the support of his wife and children and then when charged with the acts, which he admits, coolly throw upon his wife the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that if he had sued for a divorce he would have been entitled to it. This is cruel injustice to wife and children, the most defenseless persons who ask justice at the hands of a court. It cannot be supported in reason. It has no foundation in the statute and derives no authority from the definition of the word "willful" in any dictionary or in the courts of any other state than this.

In reference to the offense of abandonment and nonsupport, the law is thus summed up in 21 Cyc. 1614:

"The burden is on the state to prove every element of the offense; while the defendant bears the burden of proving his affirmative defenses. Any evidence which tends to prove or to disprove these matters is therefore admissible. The state must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt; but an affirmative defense may be established by a preponderance of the evidence."

State v. Schweitzer, 57 Conn. 543, 18 Atl. 789, 6 L. R. A. 128, is a case exactly in point. The court said:

"The defendant is charged with having unlawfully neglected and refused to support his wife. There was evidence tending to prove the marriage, and the refusal to support was not denied. The burden of proof to show the unlawfulness of the neglect was upon the state as fully as to show the neglect itself. Ordinarily the conduct of married women is such that when any husband neglects or refuses to support his wife the law itself presumes such neglect to be unlawful. Having shown the marriage and the neglect, the attorney for the state could safely rest upon that presumption. The unlawfulness was deemed to be true prima facie. And when the defendant interposed a defense based upon such misconduct of his wife as made it lawful for him to refuse to support her, it was incumbent upon him to prove such misconduct as he set up, that is, her adultery, and to prove it, as before stated, by a preponderance of evidence."

In the same case the court lays down the universal doctrine as follows:

"All authorities agree that the burden is upon the state to make out its accusation in a criminal case beyond all reasonable doubt. It seems to be agreed with substantially the same unanimity that when a defendant desires to set up a distinct defense, such as is above mentioned, he must bring it to the attention of the court; in other words, he must prove it. A fact controverted before any tribunal can hardly be said to be proved at all unless there is more evidence in its support than there is against it;" that is, the defense must be proven by preponderance of the evidence.

The charge of the court in this case was in accordance with the general principle that is thus clearly laid down.

The court charged as follows:

"There must both be an abandonment of the wife without providing adequate support, and such abandonment and failure to so provide must both be willful, and by willful is meant without just cause or excuse; wrongful, and unjustifiable. In this case, among other evidence the defendant has offered evidence tending to show that the wife was unfaithful, and that she communicated an infectious disease to him and there was evidence in contradiction. You are the sole judges of this and of all the evidence in this case and its credibility and what weight you will give it. The jury found that the defense of the misconduct of the wife was untrue."

It is true that in the Connecticut statute the word "unlawfully" is used, but that distinction is against the defendant in this case, for in State v. Massey, 97 N. C. 465, 2 S. E. 445, it is said:

In this case the act of abandonment and leaving the wife without provision was admitted by the defendant to have been done knowingly and of his stubborn purpose.

The defendant contends, however, that such burden to excuse himself does not devolve upon the defendant, but that upon all the evidence, if the jury were in doubt about it, the defendant should be found not guilty, and relies upon the instance of an alibi, citing State v. Josey, 64 N. C. 56, but the court put that defense of an alibi entirely upon the ground that it is incumbent upon the state to prove the identity of the defendant, and, if upon the whole case and considering the evidence for the defendant there is a reasonable doubt whether the defendant was the person who committed the crime or not, he should be found not guilty.

Here there is no doubt as to the identity of the defendant or of his having left his wife without adequate support, and there is nothing in the statute in the nature of an exception which the state must disprove. When the defendant relies upon the alleged misconduct of his wife, the burden is upon him to prove the truth of the defense by reason of which he would take himself from under the statute. As the judge told the jury, it was not incumbent upon the defendant to prove such defense beyond a reasonable doubt, but merely to the satisfaction of the jury.

Where insanity is pleaded, the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish such defense to the satisfaction of the jury. State v. Terry, 173 N. C. 768, 92 S. E. 154; State v. Hancock, 151 N. C. 690, 66 S. E. 137; State v. Brandon, 53 N. C. 408; State v. Starling, 51 N. C. 366.

The defendant also relies upon the proposition that on an indictment for "the slander of an innocent woman" the burden is upon the state to prove the innocence of the woman, but the gist of the indictment in that case rests upon the prosecutrix being a virtuous woman, and this must, of course, be proven as an essential ingredient of the offense.

If an indictment were allowable simply for the "slander of a woman," then the truth of the charge might be pleaded in defense, and even then the burden would be upon the defendant to prove this to the satisfaction of the jury, but the statute authorizing an indictment only for the slander of "an innocent woman" makes her innocence an essential element of the crime, and the state undertakes that burden in instituting the proceeding.

The lawmaking power has not thought proper to make it indictable to abandon an "innocent" wife without adequate support. It would be a great hardship, unauthorized by statute, to require the state to prove that the wife was virtuous and free of fault in every case where the husband has left her without adequate support. On the contrary, the offense guarded against by the statute is the abandonment by the husband "willfully"—that is, "purposely"—of his wife without adequate support for her and the children. Though the court has permitted him to exempt himself from the statute by showing that the wife has committed adultery, there is no such exception in the statute, and the court should permit him to avail himself of such defense only upon his alleging and proving it to the satisfaction of the jury. He cannot merely set up such defense and throw upon the state the burden of proving his wife is a virtuous woman.

The reasonable presumption is that, if she is not virtuous, he would avail himself of that fact by an action for divorce. It is for him to show any excuse for the intentional abandonment of his wife without adequate support.

To sustain the defendant's contention the court must necessarily hold it to be a presumption of law that, when a wife has been abandoned by a husband, beyond a reasonable doubt she has been guilty of adultery, since it holds that the burden is upon the state to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that she is not guilty thereof. There is nothing in this statute which requires this to be proven. There is nothing in the statute which authorizes it.

The defendant relies upon State v. Hopkins, 130 N. C. 647, 40 S. E. 973, in which case the learned judge was seeking to create the defense that, if a wife has been guilty of adultery, the husband should not be held liable for abandoning her. But in the absence of any such provision in the statute he endeavored in some way to annex this defense or excuse to the word "willful," with which it had no connection. The statute attached "willful" to the abandonment in contradistinction to instances in which the husband had separated himself from his wife, otherwise than willfully, as, for instance where he might be incarcerated in an asylum for the insane. At most, the proposition should be laid down that, where the wife has been guilty of adultery, it makes him excusable, but the burden is upon him to prove his defense. Even that cannot be sustained as to the children "which he may have gotten upon her," for the wife's misconduct will not justify his failure to provide support for them. State v. Kerby, supra.

The rule as to the burden of proof to be deduced from the cases is this:

"If the state's evidence, if true, shows a complete crime of purposely and willfully abandoning without providing adequate support for her, then the burden is upon the defendant to show matters and facts which will excuse his willfully leaving his wife without adequate support as the law requires." State v. Wilbourne, 87 N. C. 529, and State v. Connor, 142 N. C. 700, 55 S. E. 787.

There is not only no requirement in the statute that the state must allege or prove the virtue of the wife, but there is not even a proviso withdrawing the husband from liability in case of the wife's misconduct. It is for the defendant to allege and prove it as a defense. When the state has shown, and here the defendant has admitted it, that his wife has been abandoned by him without support, if he may withdraw himself from criminal liability therefor, he should show, if he can, that she has not been a virtuous woman since her marriage. This is a matter of defense, not a part of the offense, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant. This has been the uniform ruling of this court when there has been a proviso (and there is none here) which withdraws the defendant upon a certain state of facts from liability under the broad general terms of the statute creating the offense. State v. Norman, 13 N. C. 222; State v. Call, 121 N. C. 649, 28 S. E. 517; State v. Welch, 129 N. C. 580, 40 S. E. 120. A very similar case to this was State v. George, 93 N. C. 570, "for abduction of a child," in which the court held that the words of the proviso "without the consent and against the will of the father" were not a part of the description of the offense, and must be proven by the defendant.

In an indictment for embezzlement C. S. § 4268, "not being an apprentice or other person under 16 years of age," must be charged, but the defendant must show that he is under 16. State v. Blackley, 138 N. C. 622, 50 S. E. 310, and cases there cited. Under the former law in prosecutions for retailing spirituous liquor (Revisal, § 3529) the bill must have charged that it was done "without license," but the burden was upon the defendant to show that he had license. State v. Emery, 98 N. C. 668, 3 S. E. 636; State v. Smith, 117 N. C. 809, 23 S. E. 449; State v. Holmes, 120 N. C. 576, 26 S. E. 692, and a long line of authorities.

In an indictment for fornication and adultery (C. S. § 4343) the bill must allege "not being married to each other," but the burden is on the defendants to show that they are married as a matter of defense. State v. McDuffie, 107 N. C. 888, 12 S. E. 83; State v. Peeples, 108 N. C. 769, 13 S. E. 8; State v. Cutshall, 109 N. C. 769, 14 S. E. 107, 26 Am. St. Rep. 599.

In an indictment for entering upon land without license (C. S. § 4305) the bill must allege that the entry was "without license," but the burden is on the defendant to prove license. State v. Glenn, 118 N. C. 1194, 23 S. E. 1004.

The statute under which the defendant is indicted does not require allegation of proof that the wife was a virtuous woman, nor is there any proviso withdrawing the husband from liability if the wife has committed adultery. It is solely a matter of excuse which he must allege and prove, for there is no presumption of her guilt. In other states the courts hold that, even when the statute, unlike ours, makes the chastity of the woman a part of the description of the offense of abduction, there is a presumption in favor of female virtue, and hence, when the state has shown that the defendant has abducted or eloped with the wife of another man, the burden is on him to show that she was unchaste as a matter of defense. In the absence of proof the courts elsewhere will not presume that a woman who is shown to have been abducted was unchaste. Bradshaw v. People, 153 Ill. 159, 38 N. E. 652; Slocum v. People, 90 Ill. 281; Griffin v. State, 109 Tenn. 32, 70 S. W. 61; People v. Brewer, 27 Mich. 138; Andre v. State, 5 Iowa, 389, 68 Am. Dec. 706; State v. Higdon, 32 Iowa, 264.

The sole answer vouchsafed to all these settled precedents and principles is that the burden must be put upon the wife of proving beyond a reasonable doubt (before she can force her husband to support her and her children who he admits he has left) that she has not been guilty of adultery or any other misconduct because it is said in State v. Hopkins, supra, that the word "willful" meant not only what the statute said and the dictionaries hold, but it further means, in this particular matter, "without just cause," and therefore the burden is upon her to disprove that beyond all reasonable doubt.

When a precedent is so patently wrong and unjust to wives and children and without warrant in any statute or in any reason, it is creditable and proper to overrule it, that it may no longer be a hindrance in executing the law and doing justice. It is true the Legislature has not interfered and told the court that they had misconstrued the meaning of the word. That is a matter for the court to correct, and it should do so now. The Legislature used the word "willful" in the ordinary acceptation of the word, and as defined in all the dictionaries and in the decisions of all the courts, and there is nothing for the Legislature to amend. It used the word "willful" and no other, and the court should apply and use the settled meaning attached to that word. There is no proviso or defense which in the statute would withdraw the act of leaving the wife and children without support from the penalty provided by the statute.

There is no superstitious sanctity attaching to a precedent. It is proper that precedents should not be lightly changed or without sufficient cause. But they should not be adhered to when an opinion has clearly misconstrued a statute or is otherwise palpably erroneous.

This court has never held that it was infallible, nor has any other court. We have repeatedly overruled our own decisions, and a large pamphlet was issued some years ago containing a list of such cases, and a similar compilation now would be two or three times as large. The same is true of the United States Supreme Court and all other courts. Men and nations may—

"Rise on stepping-stones
Of their dead selves to higher things."

Courts can only maintain their authority by correcting their errors to accord with justice and the advance and progress of each age. They must slough off that which is obsolete and correct whatever is erroneous or contrary to the enlightenment and sense of justice of the age and to the spirit of new legislation.

While the courts are properly slow to change decisions unless justice requires it (as it so loudly does in this case), there are two classes of cases in which there should be close adherence to decisions:

(1) When a decision has become a rule of property. In such case the matter should be left to legislation, which speaks prospectively.

(2) As to matters of practice, which are founded not on principle, but are more or less arbitrary rules. These should be left till there is a change either in the rules of the court or by legislation. But this case does not involve a rule of property, nor is it merely a question of practice not involving a denial of justice or discrimination.

Even in such an important matter as Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, 25 Am. Dec. 677, which was decided by one of the ablest courts we ever had, and which was affirmed no less than 62 times, it was properly and justly overruled by this court in Mial v. Ellington, 134 N. C. 136, 46 S. E. 961, 65 L. R. A. 697, notwithstanding it had been held for law for more than 70 years. The court felt itself strong enough and under a duty to correct that erroneous decision. The courts do not claim infallibility. This court not infrequently overrules the court below, and in turn on writs of error our decisions have been overruled by the United States Supreme Court. That court has corrected its own errors to the extent that it has overruled a large number of its own decisions. Some years ago it held invalid a statute of the state of New York which protected working men from working more than 10 hours per day in a temperature of more than 120 degrees. Since then that court has advanced and has held valid the Adamson Law (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8680a-8680d), which protects working men in the open air from more than 8 hours labor a day. The court advanced with the age. It has overruled many other important cases. And when it has not done so the public have done so by constitutional amendments, notably by the Eleventh, the Sixteenth and other amendments.

In this state two of our most eminent judges held in State v. Black, 60 N. C. 262, 86 Am. Dec. 436, and State v. Rhodes, 61 N. C. 455, 98 Am. Dec. 78, speaking for unanimous courts, that a husband had a right to thrash his wife, even without any provocation, with the restriction only that he could not permanently injure her. In less than 10 years thereafter, in State v. Oliver, 70 N. C. 60, while both those judges were still on the bench, and counsel, as shown by his brief printed in the report of the case, relied upon those (then) recent decisions, Judge Settle speaking for a unanimous court, curtly said (with their approval), without deigning to argue the question: "We have advanced from that barbarism."

In State v. Edens, 95 N. C. 696, 59 Am. Rep. 294 (as late as 1886), the court reverted to the former ruling that a husband was not liable for beating his wife "unless the battery is so great and excessive as to put life and limb in peril or permanent injury is inflicted," and for this reason deducing the ruling that, where the husband in that case had married a young wife who refused to live in the same house with his mistress, but left him, and thereupon he circulated the vilest slanders against her, without any foundation in fact, the court held that he was not liable under the statute which made it indictable to "attempt to wantonly and maliciously injure and destroy the reputation of an innocent and virtuous woman," on the ground that the slanderer was her husband, though this was an aggravation, and not a defense. This barbarism was also overruled. State v. Fulton, 149 N. C. 485, 63 S. E. 145.

In State v. Hopkins the decision is even more barbarous, if possible, holding, without authority in any statute or in reason, and by a dictum originating in that case (which gave to the word "willful" a meaning which it does not have in the dictionaries, or in any other court), that a wife asking for legal support is presumed to be guilty of adultery or other misconduct, and that "beyond a reasonable doubt" she must prove that she is not. Surely it is time that we had advanced "from that barbarism" also, and should place ourselves in line with all the other courts which hold that there is no presumption against the virtue of women, just as there is none against the honesty of men, and that he who asserts the contrary must prove it, and when it is set up as a defense it must be shown by the defendant, and at least to the satisfaction of the jury.

No presumption that a woman has committed adultery and that she must disprove it beyond a reasonable doubt can rise merely because she asks that the courts make her husband give her and her children the support which the law requires him to give and when he admits (as in this case) or is proven leaving them without such support.

CARTER v. CARTER et ux. (No. 282.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Frauds, statute of §138(2)—Upon repudiation of parol agreement to sell, purchaser may recover price paid.

Where the full amount of the purchase money is paid and the purchaser enters into possession under a parol contract to convey land which the vendor afterwards repudiates by refusing to convey, the purchaser may recover the price paid.

2. Frauds, statute of §138(5) — Purchaser may recover for improvements upon vendor's refusal to convey.

When the purchaser has entered into possession, paid the purchase money, and made improvements on the faith of vendor's parol promise to convey, which he refuses to do, pleading the statute of frauds, the purchaser may recover, in addition to the price paid, compensation for his improvements to the extent that they have enhanced the value of the land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Columbus County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by Fannie Carter against Sam C. Carter and wife. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Error, judgment set aside, and cause remanded.

This action was brought to recover the purchase money paid by plaintiff to the defendants upon a parol contract for the purchase of land which the latter have repudiated, and refused to convey to the plaintiff, and also to recover the amount by which the land was enhanced in value by certain improvements and betterments placed by the plaintiff upon the tract of land so sold to her, as will appear from the complaint, which is as follows:

"(1) That the defendants were prior to the — day of October, 1919, the owners in fee simple of the following described tract of land: In Columbus county, state of North Carolina, adjoining the lands of — and others, and bounded as follows, viz.: Beginning at a stake the second corner of lot No. 7 and runs north 45 degrees east the line of lot No. 8, to the corner of Dunn swamp the fork of it and alley bay, thence up said bay to a black gum bay by the public road Manaduke Powell's corner, thence with the road to lot No. 7, thence with it south 70 degrees east to the beginning, containing 43 acres, more or less, and being lot No. 9 of the division of the land of James Dyson, deceased, excepting two acres already conveyed, and for a more perfect description reference is hereby made to said division and deed made by Precilla Dyson on the 7th day of June, 1888, to Samuel Merritt, and recorded July 13, 1887 in Book N-N of Deeds at page 247, records of Columbus county, in the office of register of deeds, and which is hereby referred to and made a part of this deed, which see for further description of this land.

"(2) That the plaintiff on the — day of October, 1919, purchased from the defendants above named the tract of land described in paragraph 1 of this complaint at the price of $1,750, and paid to the defendants the whole amount of said purchase price. The defendants at the time they received said purchase price promised, agreed, and contracted to execute to the plaintiff a deed for said tract of land.

"(3) That this plaintiff, immediately after she had purchased said tract of land and paid the whole amount of the purchase price therefor, erected a dwelling house on the land, which cost her $925, and also erected one tobacco barn thereon, at the cost of $350, making a total of $1,275 which the plaintiff has spent in making improvements on said tract of land, making a total including the purchase price of $3,025, which the plaintiff has expended on the tract of land.

"(4) That the plaintiff took possession of said tract of land on the — day of January, 1920, and has been living on the same, occupying the house she erected thereon as a dwelling.

"(5) That on the 5th day of March, 1920, the plaintiff had a deed in fee simple prepared from Sam C. Carter and wife, Lillian Carter, to the plaintiff, conveying to her the tract of land described in paragraph 1 of this complaint, and presented the same to Sam C. Carter and wife, Lillian Carter, and requested them to execute it in due form and according to law.

"(6) That Sam C. Carter and wife, Lillian Carter, defendants above named, failed and refused to execute the deed, and doth still refuse to execute the same to the plaintiff, in violation of their promise and agreement to convey the same.

"(7) That the defendants are now cutting and removing timber from the tract of land, and are threatening to continue to cut and remove timber therefrom, to the plaintiff's great damage of $300.

"(8) That the plaintiff has caused a summons to issue from the superior court of Columbus county in an action entitled as above.

"(9) That the defendants are insolvent as this plaintiff is informed, believes, and so alleges.

"Wherefore the plaintiff prays the court that an order be made restraining the defendants, their agents, servants, and employees, from cutting and removing any timber from said tract of land, or in any manner committing acts of trespass thereon or from going upon said tract of land, and for such other and further relief as to the court may seem proper."

Donald McRackan, of Whiteville, and S. Brown Shepherd, of Raleigh, for appellant.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). We are of the opinion that there was error in the judge's ruling. The plaintiff had entered into a parol contract with the defendants by which it was stipulated that the defendants should convey to her a certain tract of land, containing 43 acres, more or less, and particularly described in the complaint, upon the payment by the plaintiff of the purchase money, which was $1,750, and which was duly paid by the plaintiff, believing that defendants would comply with their promise and convey the land, and that, relying upon the defendants' promise, the plaintiff entered into the possession of the land, and erected valuable improvements thereon which reasonably cost $1,275. The plaintiff caused a proper deed to herself for the premises to be prepared, which was sufficient in form and substance to convey the estate promised by parol to be conveyed by the defendants to her, and defendants refused to execute the same, and now deny that the contract was ever made, pleads the statute of frauds, and claims ownership of the land, and all this notwithstanding they have the purchase money in their pocket. We must be governed in our decision by the allegations of the complaint, on which our statement of the facts is based, the court having dismissed the action upon the pleadings, and certain alleged admissions, which do not, in our opinion, affect the question, at this stage of the case, and, when so controlled we must hold that such a transaction does not look well for the defendants, and upon it the judgment of the lower court is not sustained by the law, and certainly not by equity.

[1] We have solemnly adjudged in this court, more than once, that where there is a parol contract to convey land, the full amount of the purchase money is paid, the vendee enters into possession, and the vendor afterwards repudiates the contract by refusing to make a deed for the land, the purchaser may recover the price of the land so paid by him (Durham Land, etc., Co. v. Guthrie, 116 N. C. 381, 21 S. E. 952), and further that where the vendor elects so to repudiate his parol contract by refusing to convey and sets up the statute of frauds, the purchaser may recover the amount paid by him for the land under his prayer for general relief, although the action be for specific performance (Wilkie v. Womble, 90 N. C. 254 [cited in the note, at page 879, of 19 L. R. A.]; Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. 77; Ellis v. Ellis, 16 N. C. 398). Under the old system, when the courts of law and equity were separate, it was held that the purchaser could not proceed in equity to recover the purchase price which had been paid by him, as he had a full and adequate remedy at law, that is, by an action for money had and received to his use by the vendor or for money paid under a contract, the consideration having failed by the conduct of the adverse party, but now the two systems are blended, and since 1868 that rule has become obsolete. Murdock v. Anderson, supra; Wilkie v. Womble, supra. But even under the former system, if from peculiar circumstances the remedy at law would be inadequate, the equity court would have interfered and given redress. Ellis v. Ellis, supra.

[2] The general right of the purchaser to recover what he has paid on the purchase money, and the obligation of the vendor to restore what has been unjustly received by him on his repudiated promise, results (says Smith, C. J., in Wilkie v. Womble, supra) from the annulling of the executory agreement for the sale of the land and will be enforced against the party so avoiding it. This was also held in Beaman v. Simmons, 76 N. C. 43, which was an action to recover back the purchase money paid on a repudiated, or canceled, contract. And when the purchaser has entered into possession of the land, paid the purchase money, and made improvements, on the faith of the vendor's parol promise to convey to him, which he refuses to do, and repudiates the contract by pleading the statute of frauds, the seller may recover not only the purchase money paid by him, but compensation for his improvements to the extent that they have enhanced the value of the land. Ford v. Stroud, 150 N. C. 362, 64 S. E. 1; Pass v. Brooks, 125 N. C. 129, 34 S. E. 228 (modified, but not on this point, in 127 N. C. 119, 37 S. E. 151); Albea v. Griffin, 22 N. C. 9; Hedgepeth v. Rose, 95 N. C. 41; Railroad Co. v. Battle, 66 N. C. 541; Tucker v. Markland, 101 N. C. 422, 8 S. E. 169. The court said in Pass v. Brooks, supra, 125 N. C. at page 131, 34 S. E. 228:

"The law will not allow the plaintiff to take possession of the lot without repaying the purchase money so paid to him, and without also paying for the valuable improvements put on the lot, by reason of said parol contract; this would be unjust and inequitable."

We said in Jones v. Sandlin, 160 N. C. 150, at page 154, 75 S. E. 1075, 1077:

"The general rule is that if one is induced to improve land under a promise to convey the same to him, which promise is void or voidable, and after the improvements are made he refuses to convey, the party thus disappointed shall have the benefit of the improvements to the extent that they increased the value of the land"—citing Kelly v. Johnson, 135 N. C. 647, 47 S. E. 674; Reed v. Exum, 84 N. C. 430; Luton v. Badham, 127 N. C. 96, 37 S. E. 143, 53 L. R. A. 337, 80 Am. St. Rep. 783; Albea v. Griffin, 22 N. C. 9; Hedgepeth v. Rose, 95 N. C. 41; Pitt v. Moore, 99 N. C. 85, 5 S. E. 389, 6 Am. St. Rep. 489.

This court, in Joyner v. Joyner, 151 N. C. 181, at page 182, 65 S. E. 896, 897, refers to Albea v. Griffin, supra, Baker v. Carson, 21 N. C. 381, and Pitt v. Moore, 99 N. C. 85, 5 S. E. 389, 6 Am. St. Rep. 489, and says:

"An examination of these cases, as well as Luton v. Badham, 127 N. C. 96, in which case many of the previous decisions of this court are reviewed, will disclose that the basis of the relief granted in each of these cases was a parol agreement to convey certain land, or an interest therein, which induced an expenditure of money, in good faith, in its improvements and the enrichment of the land, the repudiation of the agreement to convey, and the attempt thereby to perpetrate a fraud."

Albea v. Griffin, supra, decided that—

"Although payment of the purchase money, taking possession, and making improvements, will not entitle the vendee to the specific performance of a parol agreement for the sale of land, yet he has, in equity, a right to an account of the purchase money advanced, and the value of his improvements, deducting therefrom the annual value during his possession," and the case of Baker v. Carson, supra, was approved.

See, also, Wharton v. Moore, 84 N. C. 479, 37 Am. Rep. 627; Barker v. Owen, 93 N. C. 198, at 203.

We wish to be exactly just to the defendants, and this induces us to state that in the answer it is denied that defendants contracted with the plaintiff, as the latter alleges, but that they did contract to sell her, and did afterwards convey to her, a smaller tract of land on which the improvements were made; but we do not agree with the judge that no issues of fact or law were raised by the pleadings, or that the pleadings were in such a state that he could dismiss the action, without giving proper consideration to the plaintiff's equity, or even to his remedy at law.

The fact that plaintiff has received a deed for the land on the northwest side of the drain, and has no other deed, or other writing for any other part of the land, did not authorize a nonsuit, or dismissal of the action, because plaintiff does not allege that she had any other writing, but that by parol defendants agreed to convey the land in question and that she paid the purchase money and was let into possession of the said land, under the agreement, and then made the improvements. If it turns out that plaintiff has received some land for the purchase money paid by her, she would only be entitled to recover the fair balance due to be ascertained in the proper way.

It is not now required that we should consider the question relating to the injunction which was refused, as it is not relevant to the controversy. We do not, however, see why plaintiff should be entitled to an injunction against the cutting of timber when it appears she is not the legal or equitable owner of the land.

We may add that, when the allegations in the case are threshed out, it may finally appear that plaintiff's allegations are not sustained, and that she is really not entitled to any return, either legal or equitable. But as there was a peremptory dismissal of the case, we are not dealing with the actual facts, but with plaintiff's allegations in her complaint.

The judgment will be set aside and the case submitted to a jury upon proper issues, unless a reference, or other method of trial, is agreed upon by the parties, and the case is accordingly remanded, with directions for further proceedings therein not inconsistent with this opinion, and, in other respects, according to the course and practice of the courts.

Error.

STATE v. JENKINS. (No. 93.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 28, 1921.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  1189—Newly discovered evidence not ground for application for new trial in Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court will not grant motion for new trial in a criminal action for newly discovered evidence.

2. Larceny  $\S$  68(1)—Receiving stolen goods  $\S$  9(1)—Evidence sufficient to warrant submission of case to jury.

In a prosecution for stealing meat and for receiving and having stolen meat in possession, evidence held to warrant submission to the jury of the question of defendant's guilt as against a motion for a dismissal under C. S.  $\S$  4643.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  822(16)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt held not erroneous when considered as a whole.

In a prosecution for stealing meat and having stolen meat in possession, an instruction as to reasonable doubt, as applied to defendant's explanation of possession of the stolen property, held not erroneous when considered as a whole.

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Cranmer, Judge.

J. M. Jenkins was convicted of larceny and of having and receiving stolen goods, and he appeals. No error.

The following is the bill of indictment:

"The jurors for the state upon their oath present: That J. M. Jenkins, late of the county of Northampton, on the 5th day of March, 1921, with force and arms, in said county a lot of bacon meat of the value of $25, the goods and chattels of G. B. Warren then and there being found, then and there did feloniously steal, take, and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that on the day and year aforesaid in said county the said J. M. Jenkins a lot of bacon meat of the value of $25, the goods and chattels of G. B. Warren, then and there being found, feloniously did have and receive, well knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen, taken and carried away, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state."

Stanley Winborne and Lloyd J. Lawrence, both of Murfreesboro, and S. Brown Shepard, of Raleigh, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ADAMS, J. [1] When the case was called for argument, the defendant's counsel filed a motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. The motion must be denied. In numerous decisions this court has held that a new trial will not be awarded in a criminal action for newly discovered evidence; and in State v. Lilliston, 141 N. C. 857, 54 S. E. 427, 115 Am. St. Rep. 705, the Chief Justice said:

"So the point is settled if the uniform practice of this court and its repeated and uniform decisions to the same effect can settle anything."

See State v. Register, 133 N. C. 747, 46 S. E. 21; State v. Turner, 143 N. C. 641, 57 S. E. 158; State v. Ice Co., 166 N. C. 403, 81 S. E. 956, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 219, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 728.

[2] The defendant in apt time made a motion to dismiss the action as in case of nonsuit. C. S. § 4643. Recapitulation of the testimony would serve no useful purpose, for it is plain that the controversy could be determined only by the verdict of the jury. At the trial there was evidence tending to show that on the night of March 5 some one had broken into the prosecutor's smokehouse and had stolen six hams and six shoulders, which on March 7 were found in possession of the defendant; also evidence of various other circumstances tending to connect the defendant with the offense charged. The defendant testified, and introduced several witnesses in his behalf. An issue of fact was thus joined between the state and the defendant, and the court properly submitted to the jury the question of the defendant's guilt. In State v. Carlson, 171 N. C. 823, 89 S. E. 30, it is said:

"The motion to nonsuit requires that we should ascertain merely whether there is any evidence to sustain the allegations in the indictment. The same rule applies as in civil cases, and the evidence must receive the most favorable construction in favor of the state for the purpose of determining its legal sufficiency to convict, leaving its weight to be passed upon by the jury."

There is an exception to the charge. The record contains this statement:

"The court further charged the jury that one found in possession of stolen property recently after the commission of the theft is presumed to be the thief, but that this is a presumption of fact and not of law, and is weak or strong according to the facts and circumstances of the case; that one found in possession of goods recently stolen was called upon to account for or explain his possession by the evidence in the case and circumstances, but that this presumption arising from the possession of goods recently stolen could be rebutted and explained, and the burden was on the defendant to show to the satisfaction of the jury, if they found from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was in the possession of the stolen meat, how he came into its possession; but he would not have to show it beyond a reasonable doubt nor by a preponderance of evidence, but merely to the satisfaction of the jury; and if the evidence in the case in explanation of such possession, or any evidence or circumstances, raised a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to the guilt of the defendant that they would return a verdict of not guilty; and the court further charged the jury that before they could consider any presumption arising from what it called recent possession the jury would have to be satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the meat found in the smokehouse of the defendant was the meat in question of the prosecuting witness, and that it had been stolen.

"The court further charged the jury that the defendant was presumed to be innocent, and that this presumption of innocence continued throughout the entire case, and that before they could convict the defendant they must be satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt, and that if they were so satisfied they would find him guilty, but if they were not so satisfied they should return a verdict of not guilty."

[3] The court instructed the jury in effect that the prosecution was begun with a presumption of innocence in favor of the defendant and throughout the trial the burden remained with the state to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged in the indictment. That portion of the charge which imposed upon the defendant the burden of explaining possession of the stolen property to the satisfaction of the jury, considered alone, was technically incorrect. If, after they had considered all the evidence, the jury entertained a reasonable doubt of his guilt, the defendant was entitled to an acquittal; and such reasonable doubt may have existed although the jury may not have been satisfied with the defendant's particular explanation. However, by considering the charge in its entirety, "in the connected way in which it was given" (State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283), we observe that his honor, after saying that the burden was on the state to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, gave the additional instruction that, if the evidence in explanation of the defendant's possession of the property, or any evidence or circumstances, raised a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant the verdict should be not guilty. Upon consideration of the record we find no reversible error.

No error,

REID et ux. v. NEAL. (No. 59.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Deeds  $\Leftrightarrow$  128—Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  606(2)—Rule in Shelley's Case one of law, excluding intent.

The rule in Shelley's Case is not a rule of construction, but one of law, and, if the language used in a particular instrument brings the case within the operation of the rule, the intention of the grantor or deviser does not control.

2. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  608(3)—When rule in Shelley's Case applies stated.

In order that the rule in Shelley's Case may apply, the words "heirs" or "heirs of the body" must be taken in their technical sense, carrying the estate to the entire line of heirs, to hold as inheritors under the canons of descent, and, if it appears by correct construction that these words are not used in that sense, but only as words designating certain persons or a restricted class of heirs, the rule does not apply.

3. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  450—Should be construed to make every word effective and clauses harmonious.

A will should be construed so as to give effect to every word and every clause, and to harmonize the several clauses, provided the effect is not inconsistent with the general intent of testator as gathered from the entire instrument.

4. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  105, 493—Devise over to testator's "estate" not void for uncertainty.

Devise of land to daughter for life and at her death to her bodily heirs, if any, and if none "to return to my estate," held not void for uncertainty, since the legal significance of the word "estate" must be ascertained from the context, and, there being no residuary clause, must be held to mean heirs.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estate.]

5. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  858(1)—Office of residuary clause stated.

The office of a residuary clause in a will is to provide for the ultimate disposition of legacies and devises which are void, or have lapsed, or have been refused.

6. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  866—In absence of residuary clause, lapsed or void gifts go to next of kin or heirs.

In the absence of an effective residuary clause, a lapsed or void legacy or devise will go to the next of kin, or to the heirs of the testator, as in case of intestacy.

7. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  606(3)—Devisee held to take life "estate," and not fee, under rule in Shelley's Case.

Where testator lent land to his daughter for life, and after her death gave it to her bodily heirs, if any, "and, if none, to return to my estate," the daughter took a life estate merely, and not the fee under the rule in Shelley's Case, the devise over to the "estate" in effect being one to testator's general heirs, there being no residuary clause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Connor, Judge.

Submission of controversy without action by H. S. Reid and wife, as plaintiffs, and Oscar Neal, as defendant. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. S. Reid and wife, Laura Reid, and Oscar Neal, desiring to submit a question in difference, which might be the subject of a civil action, have agreed upon the following statement of facts, upon which the controversy depends, and present the controversy for submission to this court for determination:

(1) Laura Reid is the daughter of Ishmael Wilder, and H. S. Reid is her husband.

(2) Ishmael Wilder died domiciled in the county of Wilson, N. C., in February, 1917, having first made and published his last will and testament, by the third item of which he devised to his daughter, Laura Reid, certain lands, the following being a true and correct copy thereof, to wit: "I lend to my daughter, Laura Reid, 59½ acres, the remainder of my land, to include the house where Joe Barnes now lives, to her during her natural life, and at her death, I give it to her bodily heirs, if any, and if none, to return to my estate." The said last will and testament after having been duly proven according to law was admitted to probate and recorded in Book of Wills No. 6, p. 1, in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Wilson county.

(3) That no other item or part of said will deals in any manner with the lands devised unto Laura Reid, and there is no residuary clause therein.

(4) That, after the death of Ishmael Wilder, the devisees caused the lands to be surveyed by J. T. Revell, surveyor, on April 20, 1920, and the lands devised unto Laura Reid by the third item of said last will and testament are described as follows:

"Beginning at a stake, C. E. Brame's corner, and runs thence N. 3° E. 283 poles to a stake, H. G. Wilder's corner; thence N. 87° W. 38½ poles to a stake in Hinnant's line, H. G. Wilder's corner; thence S. 3° W. 283 poles to a stake in Brame's line; thence 87° E. 38½ poles to the beginning, containing 59½ acres, as surveyed by Jont T. Revell."

(5) That H. S. Reid and his wife, Laura Reid have contracted and agreed to sell the said 59½ acres of land to Oscar Neal, and Oscar Neal has agreed to purchase the same and to pay therefor the sum of $10,000, upon the tender to him of a good and sufficient deed, conveying unto him the said lands in fee simple.

(6) That H. S. Reid and wife, Laura Reid, have tendered unto the said Oscar Neal a deed, properly executed, conveying the said lands unto him and demanding the payment of the purchase price, according to the terms of the contract, but the said Oscar Neal declines to accept the said deed and pay the purchase price.

(7) H. S. Reid and wife, Laura Reid contend that, under the terms of the will of Ishmael Wilder, the said Laura Reid is seized in fee simple of the said land. Oscar Neal contends that, under the terms of the will of Ishmael Wilder, the said Laura Reid is not seized of a fee-simple estate therein, and she and her husband cannot convey the same to him in fee simple.

Wherefore the said parties submit to this court the determination of the question in difference between them, and if the said court shall be of the opinion that the said Laura Reid is seized of a fee-simple estate in and to the said lands, then judgment shall be rendered by the said court requiring the said Oscar Neal to accept the said lands and pay the purchase price according to the contract; but if the court shall be of opinion that the said Laura Reid is not seized of fee-simple estate in said lands, then judgment shall be rendered accordingly.

His honor, Judge George W. Connor, rendered the following judgment:

This controversy without action coming on to be heard before the undersigned resident judge of the Second judicial district, in which the county of Wilson is located, upon the agreed statement of facts submitted, and it appearing to the court that the said agreed statement of facts is properly verified under the statute and, after giving the matter consideration, the court being of the opinion that Laura Reid is seized in fee simple of the lands devised unto her by the last will and testament of Ishmael Wilder, it is, therefore, upon motion of Connor and Hill, attorneys for H. S. Reid and wife, Laura Reid, ordered, decreed, and adjudged that the said Oscar Neal accept a deed tendered to him by the said H. S. Reid and wife, Laura Reid, and pay unto them purchase price agreed upon, to wit, $10,000, and the costs of this proceeding to be taxed by the Clerk.

The defendant excepted and appealed.

E. J. Barnes, of Wilson, for appellant.

Connor & Hill, of Wilson, for appellees.

ADAMS, J. In February, 1917, Ishmael Wilder died domiciled in the county of Wilson, having made his last will and testament which has been duly proved and probated. Item 8 is as follows:

"I lend to my daughter Laura Reid, 59½ acres, the remainder of my land, to include the house where Joe Barnes now lives, to her during her natural life, and at her death, I give it to her bodily heirs, if any, and if none, to return to my estate."

The plaintiffs contend that the devise over—"to return to my estate"—is void; that the word "estate" refers, not to persons, but to the condition or circumstances in which the testator stood with reference to his property—the nature and extent of his interest; that there is confusing uncertainty as to the persons who might succeed to the title upon the failure of the feme plaintiff's "bodily heirs," and that the devisee, Laura Reid, has an estate in fee simple under the rule in Shelley's Case. It therefore becomes necessary to decide whether the rule in Shelley's Case applies, and, if it does not, to construe the devise under which the feme plaintiff claims title to the land.

This noted rule, a prolific source of litigation, is stated by Coke as follows:

"When an ancestor, by any gift of conveyance, taketh an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs in fee or in tail, the word heirs is a word of limitation of the estate, and not a word of purchase." 1 Coke, 104.

In Kent's Commentaries, as a citation of Preston's definition, the rule is given in this language:

"Where a person takes an estate of freehold, legally or equitably, under a deed, or will, or other writing, and in the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder, either with or without the interposition of another estate, of any interest of the same legal or equitable quality to his heirs, or heirs of his body, as a class of persons to take in succession from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs entitles the ancestor to the whole estate." 4 Kent, Com. 215.

[1] It is held with practical unanimity that the principle stated is not a rule of construction, but a rule of law. If the language used in a particular instrument brings the case within the operation of the rule, the intention of the grantor or deviser does not control.

In Nobles v. Nobles, 177 N. C. 245, 98 S. E. 715, Justice Hoke, speaking for this court, said:

"The rule in question has always been recognized with us, and a perusal of these and other like cases will disclose that, when the terms of the instrument by correct interpretation convey the estate in remainder to the heirs of the first taker as a class, 'to take in succession from generation to generation,' to the same persons as those who would take as inheritors under our canons of descent and in the same quantity, the principle prevails as a rule of property both in deeds and wills, and regardless of any particular intent to the contrary otherwise appearing in the instrument."

This court has had occasion from time to time to construe divers instruments in which the language used bears striking similarity to the language in the devise under consideration. Recourse to former adjudications may, in the present instance, serve to direct us to the correct conclusion.

In Francks v. Whitaker, 118 N. C. 518, 21 S. E. 175, the devise was in these words:

"I give and devise (real estate) to my beloved son E. S. Francks, during his natural life, and after his death to his lawful heir or heirs, should he have any surviving him, but should he not have any lawful heir or heirs surviving him, then I give and devise the same to the children of my beloved son W. W. Francks."

The court held that the proper construction of the will is as if it read:

"I give and devise to my beloved son E. S. Francks, during his natural life, and after his death to his issue, should he leave any surviving him, but should he not leave issue then I give and devise the same to the children of my beloved son W. W. Francks."

In Bird v. Gilliam, 121 N. C. 327, 28 S. E. 489, the devise was:

"To my daughter Mary during her natural life and give the same to the heirs of her body, but if my daughter Mary should not have no lawful heirs of her body the said land at her death shall go back to my son William and the heirs of his body."

The court said:

"The rule in Shelley's Case does not apply here. If there had been no words explanatory of the words 'heirs of her body' in connection with the estate devised to Mary, she would under the rule, have taken the fee. Nichols v. Gladden, 117 N. C. 497. But there were such explanatory words where the testator said: 'But if my daughter Mary should not have no lawful heirs of her body the said land,' etc. Such explanatory words have been construed by this court to mean 'issue.' Rollins v. Keel, 115 N. C. 68. Mary then took only a life estate."

The case of May v. Lewis, 182 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550, is of similar import. There the devise was in the following words:

"I loan unto my son Benjamin May my entire interest in the tract of land * * * to be his during his natural life, and at his death I give said land to his heirs, if any, to be theirs in fee simple forever; and if he should die without heirs, said land to revert back to his next of kin."

The court held that the son took a life estate, saying that—

"Any words added to the limitation which carry the estate to any other person, in any other manner or in any other quality than the canons of descent provide, will take the case out of the operation of the 'rule,' and limit the interest of the first-taker to an estate for his life."

Puckett v. Morgan, 158 N. C. 344, 74 S. E. 15, presents the case of a devise, the terms of which, excepting the last clause, are substantially identical with the language used in this case:

"I leave Martha Morgan, the wife of James Morgan, 48½ acres of land, known as the Rachael tract, on the east side, during her life, then to her bodily heirs, if any; but if she have none, back to her brothers and sisters."

Martha Morgan died in 1894, leaving two daughters, one of whom was the plaintiff, who had intermarried with P. H. Puckett. James Morgan, the surviving husband of Martha, was in possession of the land, claiming a life estate as tenant by the curtesy. Upon demurrer, the judge held that under Shelley's Case Mrs. Morgan took an estate in fee, and that the defendant was entitled to the possession of the land during his life. But in the opinion of this court Justice Brown said:

"It is also manifest that the testator did not intend that his daughter should take an estate in fee, for in express words he devised her an estate for life only, and the context shows that he intended that her children should take at her death, and, in the event of her death without children, then that her brothers and sisters should receive the property."

These precedents are maintained in the more recent decisions of this court. Blackledge v. Simmons, 180 N. C. 535, 105 S. E. 202; Wallace v. Wallace, 181 N. C. 158, 108 S. E. 501. In the former case there was a devise of real estate to the testator's daughter for life, and at her death unto the heirs of her body lawfully begotten, with a provision that, in the event of her dying without heirs of her body, the land should go to the testator's heirs at law. Justice Walker, citing numerous decisions bearing upon the question, concluded that the words "heirs of her body" should not be construed in their technical sense, as denoting an entire class of heirs to take in indefinite succession, but should be construed as meaning the children of the testator's designated child. Accordingly it was held that the first taker acquired a life estate and the children an estate in fee as purchasers. In the latter case, Elisha Wallace and his wife executed a deed conveying to C. A. Wallace a tract of land, to hold during his natural life, subject to the support and protection of the grantors during their lifetime. In the deed is this additional provision:

"And then after the death of the above said C. A. Wallace, then said land to descend in fee simple to his bodily heirs if any, and if none, to go to his next of kin."

C. A. Wallace died without the birth of issue, and made his will devising the land for life to his widow, Selma, "and at her death to the children of R. I. Wallace." The representatives and children of the deceased brothers and sisters of C. A. Wallace instituted a special proceeding for partition, making parties his widow and his surviving brothers and sisters. The widow and the petitioners contended that C. A. Wallace took an estate in fee simple, while the defendants insisted that he took only a life estate, and that upon his death they acquired title to the land by virtue of the limitation to the next of kin. In an opinion reviewing the authorities, Justice Hoke said:

"We must * * * hold that C. A. Wallace took only a life estate under the deed from his father, and that under the ulterior limitation to his next of kin, the property belongs to his surviving brothers and sisters to the exclusion of the widow and his nephews and nieces."

[2] The prevailing doctrine drawn from the decisions in this jurisdiction is crystalized in Wallace v. Wallace in the following paragraph:

"From these and other authorities it will be noted that, in order to an application of the rule in Shelley's Case (being contrary as it is to the expressed will of the grantor that the first taker should have a life estate only), the words 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body' must be taken in their technical sense carrying the estate to the entire line of heirs and at this time and in this jurisdiction to hold as inheritors under our canons of descent, and if it appears by correct construction that these words are not used in that sense, but only as words designating certain persons or confining the inheritance to a restricted class of heirs, the rule does not apply and the ancestor or first taker will be held to have acquired only a life estate according to the express words of the instrument."

But the plaintiffs insist that the instruments construed in these decisions may be differentiated, in that the ulterior devise in the instant case, limited not to a person or class of persons, but to "my estate," is void because indefinite and uncertain. The immediate question, then, is this: "What is the proper legal construction of the words 'if any, and if none, to return to my estate'?"

It is true that the rule in Shelley's Case is a rule of law, and not of construction; but whether the ulterior devise is valid, or whether the limitation is to the "technical heirs" of the first taker, or to a particular class of heirs, is essentially a preliminary question as to the construction of the particular instrument under consideration; and the intent of the grantor or deviser is to be disregarded only where a proper interpretation of his language brings the particular case within the rule. Puckett v. Morgan, supra; Blackledge v. Simmons, supra. In construing this clause: "If any, and if none, to return to my estate"—the intent of the testator must be sought unless we hold as a matter of law that the clause is void upon its face. If the words referred to are susceptible of any construction which is consistent with the validity of the will in its entirety, we cannot declare them void without doing violence to one of the cardinal rules of construction.

[3] A will should be construed so as to give effect to every word and every clause, and to harmonize the several clauses provided the effect is not inconsistent with the general intent and purpose of the testator as gathered from the entire instrument. 30 A. & E. En. (2d Ed.) 664; Gardner on Wills, 373; Satterwaite v. Wilkinson, 173 N. C. 39, 31 S. E. 599.

[4] It cannot be successfully urged that the word "estate" makes the last limitation void for uncertainty. This word has more than one meaning, and is susceptible of more than one construction. Anciently confined to land, it has been enlarged so as to embrace property of every description. Enumerated with words which are descriptive of personal or chattel interests, it may exclude real estate altogether. It may denote the quantity of interest, or the thing devised, or the condition or circumstances in which the owner stands in regard to his property. 3 Words and Phrases, First Series, 2475 et seq. Also, it has been construed as meaning a person. Bennett v. State, 62 Ark. 516, 36 S. W. 948. Its legal signification must be ascertained from the context, or an examination of all the provisions of the instrument in which it appears. In Downing v. Grigsby, 251 Ill. 568, 96 N. E. 513, it is said that the ordinary meaning of the words "revert to my estate" is, "return to the aggregate of all the property which I may leave at my death."

It will be observed that in the last will and testament of Ishmael Wilder there is no residuary clause—in fact no clause, excepting item 3—which purports to deal with the land in question. If Laura Reid die without bodily heirs, or children, or "issue" (Francks v. Whitaker, supra; Bird v. Gilliam, supra; C. S. § 1759), and effect be given to the ulterior limitation, in whom will the title vest?

[5, 6] The office of the residuary clause in a will is to provide for the ultimate disposition of legacies and devises which are void, or have lapsed, or have been refused. In the absence of an effective residuary clause, a lapsed or void legacy or devise will go to the next of kin, or to the heirs of the testator, as in case of intestacy. Johnson v. Johnson, 38 N. C. 428; Winston v. Webb, 62 N. C. 1, 93 Am. Dec. 599; Robinson v. McIver, 63 N. C. 645; Twitty v. Martin, 90 N. C. 643.

[7] After a careful consideration of the authorities, we conclude that effect must be given to the ulterior limitation, "and if none to return to my estate"; that the testator gave to his daughter Laura a life estate, with remainder in fee, defeasible upon the failure of her "bodily heirs" (Kirkman v. Smith, 174 N. C. 603, 94 S. E. 423); and that the devise in item 3 should be construed as if it read:

"I devise to my daughter, Laura Reid, 59½ acres, the remainder of my land, to include the house where Joe Barnes now lives, to her during her natural life, and at her death, I give it to her issue, if any, and if none, to my heirs"

—i. e., in the absence of a residuary clause, to those who would have been entitled had the testator died intestate. It is obvious, then, that under the will of her father Laura Reid takes only a life estate, and that the plaintiffs cannot convey the land in fee simple. The judgment is therefore reversed.

Reversed.

SPOONER v. SHELFER et al. (No. 2529.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Landlord and tenant §296(2)—Vendor and purchaser §3(2)—Contract held lease with option to purchase, not contract of sale, and landlord might sue out warrant of ejectment after term.

The contract (set out in the statement of facts) examined, and construed to be a lease with an option to the lessee to buy at the stipulated price, exercisable within the time specified during the term of the lease, upon the lessee's full performance of the terms of the contract; and after the expiration of the rent term it was the right of the landlord to sue out a warrant, under section 5385 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910, for the tenant's summary eviction.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; R. C. Bell, Judge.

Action by J. M. Spooner against N. H. Shelfer and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On March 9, 1920, N. H. Shelfer and Mrs. Julia M. Spooner entered into a written contract, executed in duplicate, by the terms of which Shelfer agreed to "rent, let, and lease" certain land to Mrs. Spooner, in consideration of $1,000 paid, for the remainder of the year 1920, "and up to the 1st day of January, 1921." In consideration of the cash payment Shelfer further agreed to make no additional charge for the use of the land "during the time that the said Mrs. Spooner has been in possession of the same prior to the execution of this agreement." The contract stipulated:

"It is further agreed and understood that the said Mrs. Julia M. Spooner shall have the right and privilege of converting this lease into an agreement on the part of the said N. H. Shelfer to sell and deed to her said above-described property for the sum of * * * $6,500, by paying in cash to the said N. H. Shelfer, on or before the 1st day of May, 1920, the sum of $2,250, and contemporaneously therewith executing and delivering to him her promissory note of the date the option is exercised, and due July 1, 1920, for the principal sum of $3,250, with interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, with 10 per cent. of principal and interest as attorney's fees, if collected by law. * * * In the event the option to purchase said property is exercised under the terms herein stated, then and in that event the $1,000 cash this day paid as rental shall be applied on the purchase price," and the payment of the sums aforesaid, as specified, "shall be in full consideration of the deed."

The contract further provided that it was "clearly and expressly understood and agreed that the option to buy said property shall be exercised only in the manner herein prescribed," and that "in the event the said Mrs. Spooner does not exercise her option to buy said property on or before the said 1st day of May, 1920," by paying the sum named in cash and by executing the promissory note as aforesaid, "then and in that event the option herein expressed shall become null and void, and the $1,000 this day paid shall be in consideration, and only in consideration, of the rental of said property up to the 1st day of January, 1921," on which date Mrs. Spooner agreed to surrender the premises "in as good condition as when she took possession of the same, usual wear and tear excepted." The contract recited that it "expresses the full and complete agreement between the parties hereto, and that no verbal interpolations can be inserted or insisted upon at any time by either of said parties." Mrs. Spooner paid to Shelfer $1,000 and entered into or remained in possession of the land. She did not pay or offer to pay the $2,250 on or by the 1st day of May, 1920, and she did not execute and deliver, or offer to execute and deliver, to Shelfer her promissory note for $3,250, due July 1, 1920, as stipulated in the contract. Mrs. Spooner remained in possession of the land until February 22, 1921, on which date Shelfer sued out a warrant to evict her as a tenant holding over.

Thereupon Mrs. Spooner filed her petition against Shelfer, alleging that the contract was one of purchase, and that the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist by virtue thereof; that she had paid the $1,000 cash, whereas, the reasonable value of the premises for rent for the year 1920 was not more than $294; and that she was making every effort to dispose of other property belonging to her (and of the value of $5,000) in order to enable her to pay the purchase money as stipulated in the contract. She prayed for injunction against the further progress of the warrant to evict. Shelfer filed an answer, alleging that the relation between the parties was that of landlord and tenant, that Mrs. Spooner had not exercised the option to purchase, and that his right to evict her as a tenant holding over exists, both under the contract and under the law. The plaintiff testified that she was making a bona fide effort to sell certain property owned by her, for the purpose of paying the defendant, but that she had been unable to sell her property on account of the general financial depression, and consequently had not paid the defendant the $2,250 at the time of the suing out by the defendant of the warrant to evict, or at the date of the hearing. That the written contract expressed the purpose and intention of the parties to it was admitted; but she contended that the relation of the parties under the contract was that of vendor and vendee, and not that of landlord and tenant. The court denied an interlocutory injunction, and Mrs. Spooner excepted.

W. V. Custer, of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error.

Erle M. Donalson, of Bainbridge, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is not contended that the written contract did not express the intention and purpose of the parties to it. The contract is plain and unambiguous. It is the only evidence of what the parties intended and understood by it. In these circumstances the whole duty of the court is to construe the contract. That the provision in the lease, giving the lessee an option to purchase the premises, if she so desired, in no way affected the relation of landlord and tenant, or the former's right to evict the latter, if she held over and beyond her term, must be considered as settled. Clifford v. Gressinger, 96 Ga. 789, 22 S. E. 399; Crawford v. Cathey, 143 Ga. 403, 85 S. E. 127. The parties designate their contract as one of lease. By its plain terms it is such. Mrs. Spooner was also given an option to buy during the term of the lease. The consideration paid was for the use of the premises to the end of the term stipulated, and, it would seem, for the option to purchase. But Mrs. Spooner was not bound to purchase. She did not obligate herself to pay $2,250 on or by May 1, 1920, and to execute and deliver to Sheller her promissory note for $3,250 due and payable July 1, 1920. The consideration paid may be in excess of the fair rental value of the premises for the term stipulated; but Mrs. Spooner obtained, not only the right to use and occupy the premises, but the privilege and the power to buy the premises upon the terms stated. If the contract expresses the true intention and purpose of the parties to it, Mrs. Spooner was not entitled to an injunction.

The case of Lytile v. Scottish American Mortgage Co., 122 Ga. 458, 50 S. E. 402, does not demand a construction that the contract in this case creates the relation of vendor and vendee. That case does not authorize us to so construe the contract here involved. The distinction between that case and the case at bar is clearly pointed out in Crawford v. Cathey, supra. Under the cases of Crawford v. Cathey and Clifford v. Gressinger, supra, we are compelled to construe the contract between the parties in this case as a lease with an option to buy. Mrs. Spooner never having exercised the option the relation of landlord and tenant continued, and the landlord had the right to evict the tenant holding over beyond the term.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., absent on account of sickness.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Cancellation of instruments  $\S$ 46—Appeal and error  $\S$ 1050(1)—Record setting aside year's support admissible in action to cancel deed, and harmless, if erroneous.

The court did not err in admitting the record setting aside year's support, for the reasons:

(a) There was some evidence that William E. Smith, from whose estate the year's support was set aside, and who was the husband of Emma Smith, the original plaintiff, died in possession of the land in question. Moreover, the sole issue was the question of cancellation of the deed, and therefore the introduction of the evidence showing that the land was set aside as year's support was not injurious to the objectors, who were grantees in the deed.

(b) Under the facts of the case the jury were authorized to find that the deed, cancellation of which was sought, purported to convey land set aside in the year's support.

2. Motion for new trial properly overruled.

With the exception of the assignment of error mentioned in the preceding headnote, there is no complaint of any rulings of the court during the progress of the trial. The verdict is supported by evidence. The court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Atkinson County; A. B. Lovett, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Emma Smith against Bob Smith and others, in which J. O. White, guardian of minor children of the plaintiff, intervened upon her death. From an adverse judgment, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Emma Smith filed a petition praying that a deed which she had made conveying described land to Bob Smith et al., be set aside and canceled. The petitioner [grantor named in the deed] was the widow of W. E. Smith. The grantees named are children of W. E. Smith by a former wife. The petition alleged that the property involved was, with other property, set aside to petitioner and her two minor children as year's support; that the deed conveying the land to the defendants was void and should be set aside for the reasons (a) she received no consideration for the same; (b) that it was obtained by duress in that the defendants threatened to take all the property which had been set aside to her as year's support; that they would burn her out and would kill her if she did not make the deed to them; (c) that the deed was obtained through fraud in that the defendants represented to petitioner that she could not get possession of any of the property assigned as year's support unless she would make to them a deed to the land involved, and that because of her ignorance, inexperience, and fear, caused by the threats made, she was induced to execute the deed; that while the deed purports to be a deed of gift, she had no reason for giving the grantees anything; that she did not know the purport and meaning of the deed, and the same was not her voluntary act. The two minor children of Mrs. Emma Smith, through their next friend, intervened, setting up the fact that the original plaintiff had died; that they were her sole heirs; that at the time of the execution of the deed their mother was, because of the impairment of her mental faculties, incapacitated to make an intelligent and voluntary disposition of her property, and praying that they be made parties plaintiff and that the cause proceed in their name and for their benefit.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Motion for a new trial was filed and subsequently amended, which was overruled by the court, and the defendants excepted. The sole ground of the amended motion complains that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to introduce documentary evidence to show that the land had been set aside as a year's support. The objections urged against this evidence at the time of its introduction were (1) that the land in question was not shown to have been in the possession of W. E. Smith at the time of his death, and (2) because the proceedings setting aside year's support described the land as "one hundred and fifty acres of lot of land No. 63 in the Seventh district of Coffee county," while the deed, cancellation of which is sought, describes the land as "being parts of lots Nos. 63 and 39 in the Seventh district of Coffee county."

S. Burkhalter, of Homerville, and R. A. Moore, of Douglas, for plaintiffs in error.

Levi O'Steen, of Douglas, for defendant in error.

BLACKSTOCK v. BLACKMAN. (No. 2470.)
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Execution  $\Rightarrow$  200—Overruling of motion to dismiss levy not ground for new trial.

On the trial of a claim case the overruling of a motion to dismiss the levy cannot be made a ground of a motion for a new trial, but should be made the subject of direct exception.

2. Execution  $\Rightarrow$  194(3), 202—No verdict in favor of plaintiff in execution in claim case, in absence of evidence of unsatisfied execution.

"There can be no legal verdict in favor of the plaintiff in execution in a claim case, unless there is introduced in evidence at the trial a valid, unsatisfied execution in favor of the plaintiff in execution against the defendant in execution." Collins v. Hill, 115 Ga. 485, 41 S. E. 678. This principle is applicable where, although what purports to be a fi. fa. is copied in the record, there is no reference to its introduction in evidence, nor to its connection with any paper used in the trial of the case, and where the bill of exceptions does not specify the fi. fa. as a part of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of.

3. New trial  $\Rightarrow$  128(2)—Motion grounded on admission of evidence held not in proper form.

We do not rule upon that ground of the motion for a new trial assigning error on the introduction of the record of deeds as secondary evidence, objected to on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence that the notice to produce the originals was made as provided by law. The motion includes numerous questions and answers and colloquies, and is not in proper form, and, moreover, before another trial the plaintiff will have an opportunity, if he so desires, to obviate the issue before the trial court.

4. New trial  $\Rightarrow$  128(2)—Assignment of error as to admission of testimony partly admissible, without merit.

Where error is assigned, as in several grounds of the amended motion, on the admission of testimony consisting of oral and documentary evidence, some of which was admissible, such assignment is without merit and shows no cause for the grant of a new trial.

5. Execution  $\Rightarrow$  193—Only issue in claim case is whether property was subject to fi. fa.

This is an ordinary claim case, and the only issue which could have properly been determined is whether or not the property was subject to the fi. fa. It was therefore error to allow the plaintiff in fi. fa. to testify that the nature of the indebtedness on which the judgment was based, and for which the fi. fa. was issued, was borrowed money. Compare Allen v. Middleton, 99 Ga. 758, 27 S. E. 752; Southern Mining Co. v. Brown, 107 Ga. 264(3), 33 S. E. 73.

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Claim by Mrs. W. V. Blackstock to property levied upon by sheriff under a fi. fa. in favor of R. T. Blackman against W. V. Blackstock. From an adverse judgment, claimant brings error. Reversed.

Griffith & Matthews and J. S. Edwards, all of Buchanan, for plaintiff in error.

H. J. McBride, of Tallapoosa, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. Mrs. W. V. Blackstock filed a claim to a house and lot in the city of Bremen, and in her claim affidavit she stated that the said property had been levied upon by the sheriff under and by virtue of a fi. fa. in favor of R. T. Blackman against W. V. Blackstock. The property was found subject, and Mrs. Blackstock, claimant, made a motion for a new trial, and subsequently amended the same, which was overruled, and she excepted. The evidence in regard to possession of the property at the time of the rendition of the judgment and subsequently was conflicting. The levy is not set out in the record, and it is to be assumed that it contained no recital as to possession. It does not appear from the record that the claimant made any admissions in respect thereto, and the jury might have found either way. The plaintiff's fi. fa. was not introduced in evidence. In the record before us, immediately following the claim affidavit and the entry of filing the same, appears what purports to be a copy of a fi. fa. from a judgment rendered by the city court of Atlanta in favor of R. V. Blackman as plaintiff against W. V. Blackstock as defendant, dated the 14th day of May, 1912. The bill of exceptions recites that R. T. Blackman is plaintiff in fi. fa., thus showing a variance between this fi. fa. and the name of the plaintiff in fi. fa. as to the second initial. The motion for new trial contained the general grounds and the following amended grounds:

"First. Movant contends that the court committed error on the trial of said case in admitting in evidence the record of a deed purporting to be a deed from H. J. Denham to W. V. Blackstock purporting to convey the premises in dispute, upon the introduction of the following evidence offered by the plaintiff, laying the foundation for the introduction of said deed as secondary evidence."

Then follow three typewritten pages of questions to and answers of witnesses on direct and cross-examination, and colloquies of counsel in regard to whether notice to produce two deeds had been legally served on the claimant and as to the admissibility of the secondary evidence. The second ground of the amended motion complains that the "court committed error on the trial of said case, as movant contends, in admitting in evidence the following testimony of S. J. Ayers, a witness testifying for the plaintiff in said case," and certain documentary evidence. Then follow about three typewritten pages of questions and answers and colloquies, and a statement of the documentary evidence offered, such evidence tending to show ownership of the premises by defendant in fi. fa. The third ground of the amended motion complains of the refusal of the court to rule out testimony to the effect that the property in question was levied upon, such testimony failing to show definitely that the execution levied was the one which had resulted in the claim. The fourth ground of the amended motion complains that—

"The court committed error on the trial of said case in overruling the motion of counsel for claimant, made to the court at the conclusion of the evidence offered by the plaintiff, to dismiss the levy of the plaintiff and to dismiss said case."

Then follows the ground of said motion to dismiss and argument of counsel in favor of the dismissal, and the further recital, "Whereupon the court did then and there overrule said motion, refused to dismiss said case, allowed the case to go to the jury, which ruling movant insists was error," for the reasons recited. Then follow the reasons assigned therefor. The fifth ground of the amended motion complains that the court committed error on the trial of said case in admitting to the jury trying said case the following evidence of R. T. Blackman, the plaintiff:

"Q. What was the nature of the indebtedness on which the judgment was based for which this fi. fa. was issued? A. It was borrowed money."

The objection urged at the time was that such evidence was incompetent and immaterial, and that the note on which the judgment and execution was rendered was the highest and best evidence; the court ruling, after such objections were made, "I will admit as circumstances in the case." The last two grounds of the amended motion complain of the admission as evidence of certain entries in the tax digest. The objection urged against this testimony at the time was that the property set out in the tax digest is not sufficiently identified as the property set out in the levy, and on the further ground that it shows entirely different property. The court overruled the objection. The issues raised under the evidence in this case are ruled upon in the headnotes, and it is unnecessary to elaborate upon the rulings there made.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., absent on account of sickness.

HARRIS v. STATE. (No. 2568.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  151—Time to be allowed counsel to prepare for trial in sound discretion of trial court.

"The time to be allowed counsel to prepare for trial is in the sound discretion of the trial judge, which discretion will not be interfered with by this court, unless abused. No unusual or intricate matters of law or fact appearing, and nothing being shown as to public excitement, there was no abuse of discretion in overruling the motion for a continuance upon the grounds of want of time to prepare for trial." Charlon v. State, 106 Ga. 400 (2), 32 S. E. 347; Kelloy v. State, 151 Ga. —, 107 S. E. 488.

2. Corpus delicti established.

There were sufficient circumstances, together with the admission of the shooting by the defendant, to establish the corpus delicti.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  516—Homicide  $\S$  187—Statement to sheriff held admissible.

Error is assigned because the court permitted the sheriff to testify as follows: "I had a conversation with Gene Harris [defendant] some time after he was placed in my custody. He was there one day at the door, and I asked him why he wanted to kill his wife, and he said he did it in self-defense, and I think he tried to show me some scars on him, and I paid no attention." The objection to this evidence was that it was not a confession. The court ruled that "If he stated to the sheriff he killed his wife in self-defense, it would be relevant testimony, if the solicitor desires to introduce it." Held that, while the evidence did not amount to a confession of guilt by the accused, it was relevant on the issues in the case.

4. Materiality of errors.

Other assignments of error on the admissibility of evidence, where sufficient to raise any question for consideration by this court, are not of sufficient materiality to cause the grant of a new trial.

5. Criminal law  $\S$  784(3)—No error in failure to charge upon circumstantial evidence.

Where one accused of a homicide admits the killing but in connection with the admission states that he acted in self-defense, and where in his statement to the jury he also admits the shooting of the deceased, but claims justification, the case is not one dependent wholly upon circumstantial evidence; the failure of the court to charge upon that subject is not cause for reversal. Heberhart v. State, 47 Ga. 508, 509 (8); Griner v. State, 121 Ga. 614 (2), 49 S. E. 700; Wilburn v. State, 141 Ga. 510, 518 (9), 81 S. E. 444.

6. Criminal law  $\S$  781(2), 824(5), 826—Charge on confessions held authorized; timely and proper request for instructions necessary.

Where, upon the trial of one accused of homicide, the accused admitted the killing of the deceased, but claimed that he was justified in so doing, a charge on the law of confessions is unauthorized. Owens v. State, 120 Ga. 296, 48 S. E. 21. Moreover, the failure of the court to charge the law of confessions, in the absence of an appropriate and timely request, is not cause for the grant of a new trial. Benjamin v. State, 150 Ga. 78, 102 S. E. 427.

7. Witnesses  $\S$  77—Child of nine years of age may be competent.

On objection to the testimony of a child nine years of age as a witness, based on his youthfulness, the answers given in response to questions were sufficient to authorize the judge to hold the witness competent to testify. Lucas v. State, 146 Ga. 315 (2), 91 S. E. 72.

8. Sufficiency of evidence.

The jury were authorized, under the evidence, to find the defendant guilty.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Gene (alias James) Harris was convicted of homicide, and brings error. Affirmed.

T. D. Luther and D. S. Sanford, both of Milledgeville, for plaintiff in error.

Doyle Campbell, Sol. Gen., and A. Y. Clement, both of Monticello, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HILL, J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., absent on account of sickness.

CONLEY v. CONLEY. (No. 2431.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading  $\S$  243—Petition addressed to judge amendable by addressing it to court.

A petition addressed to the judge of the superior court, and praying process requiring the defendant to appear at the next term of the superior court, is amendable by addressing the petition to the superior court of the county in which the suit is brought. Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  5682, 5691; Parish v. Davis, 126 Ga. 840, 55 S. E. 1082.

2. Divorce  $\S$  214(3)—Evidence of good character admissible in reply to evidence of specific acts of adultery.

Where a libel for divorce is filed by a wife against her husband on the ground of desertion and cruel treatment, and the defendant by way of answer alleges acts of adultery on the part of the wife, it is competent, on the trial of the question of temporary alimony, for the wife to offer evidence of general good character in reply to evidence tending to show specific acts of adultery. Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  5745; Du Bose v. Du Bose, 75 Ga. 753.

5. Affidavits ¶18—Served on opposing counsel day before hearing properly excluded.

The court did not err in excluding an affidavit of a witness for the defendant (plaintiff in error) on the ground that it was served on the opposite party or her counsel one day before the hearing, and not three days as required by the order of the judge; it appearing that the witness who gave the affidavit resided outside of the state, and that the defendant in error would not have time to answer the affidavit by counter affidavit before the hearing. Huff v. Markham, 70 Ga. 284; Hester v. Exley, 130 Ga. 460, 60 S. E. 1053.

4. Alimony properly allowed.

Under the evidence in the case the trial judge did not err in awarding $15 a month alimony and $35 counsel fees to the defendant in error.

5. Divorce ¶243—Judgment for alimony construed as relating back to filing of suit.

Where a petition was filed December 11, 1921, and the trial judge awarded $15 alimony "for the month of December," the judgment will be construed as relating back to the filing of the suit. See Swearingen v. Swearingen, 19 Ga. 285 (4).

Error from Superior Court, Evans County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Action by Ruth Conley against W. P. Conley for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. H. Burroughs and J. S. Daniel, both of Claxton, for plaintiff in error.

Girardeau & Elmore and Anderson & Hodges, all of Claxton, and W. G. Warnell, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Municipal corporations ¶636—Statute held not to authorize city recorder to punish acts committed beyond corporate limits.

An ordinance of the city of Savannah providing that "any person who shall, in the night or day, disturb the peace and quiet of the city in any manner whatsoever, or shall be guilty of any riotous, disorderly, or improper conduct, or keep a disorderly house within the limits of the city of Savannah, * * * shall, on conviction before the police court, be fined * * * or imprisoned" (as therein provided), does not authorize the recorder of the city of Savannah to try and punish for acts committed beyond the corporate limits of the city but within three miles thereof. This is true notwithstanding the provision of the act of the General Assembly approved Aug. 11, 1906 (Ga. Laws 1906, p. 1033), extending the jurisdiction of the police court of the city of Savannah "to try all offenses against the laws and ordinances of the municipal government of the city of Savannah committed within the corporate limits of said city and within three miles thereof, and extending into the county of Chatham." Under proper construction of the ordinance only acts committed within the corporate limits of the city of Savannah are declared to be unlawful.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Municipal corporations ¶120—Ordinance prohibiting acts on pain of imprisonment strictly construed.

An ordinance of a city providing for imprisonment of one disturbing the peace, or guilty of riotous, disorderly, or improper conduct, should be strictly construed.

Question certified by Court of Appeals.

Abe Raskin was convicted of a violation of an ordinance of the City of Savannah, and brought error to the appellate court, which certifies questions. Answer in the negative.

The Court of Appeals requested instruction from the Supreme Court upon the following question:

"An ordinance of the city of Savannah is as follows: 'Any person who shall, in the night or day, disturb the peace and quiet of the city in any manner whatsoever, or shall be guilty of any riotous, disorderly, or improper conduct, or keep a disorderly house within the limits of the city of Savannah, such person shall, on conviction before the police court, be fined in a sum not exceeding one hundred * * * dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding thirty * * * days, or both, at the discretion of the police court; each day's keeping of a disorderly house to be considered a separate offense.'

"It is provided by an act of the General Assembly of Georgia approved August 11, 1906 (Ga. L. 1906, p. 1033), that 'The police court of the city of Savannah is hereby continued a court of record, and shall have jurisdiction to try all offenses against the laws and ordinances of the municipal government of the city of Savannah committed within the corporate limits of said city and within three miles thereof, and extending into the county of Chatham, and to punish for the violation of such laws and ordinances by inflicting such punishments as may be provided by law.'

"Under and by virtue of this act of the Legislature, was the recorder of the city of Savannah authorized to administer punishment for a violation of the city ordinance referred to, where the offense occurred outside the corporate limits of the city of Savannah but within three miles thereof? In other words, did this act of 1906 automatically, so to speak, amend the city ordinance referred to, so that that ordinance was violated if the acts therein made penal were done within the corporate limits of the city of Savannah or within three miles thereof?"

Robt. L. Colding, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Shelby Myrick and E. A. Cohen, both of Savannah, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. [1,2] If the provision of the act of the General Assembly approved August 11, 1906 (Ga. L. 1906, p. 1033), quoted above, confers authority upon the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah to declare penal an act committed beyond the corporate limits of the city but within three miles thereof, the ordinance in question does not undertake to exercise the power conferred. The ordinance must be strictly construed. Under proper construction, only acts committed within the corporate limits of the city of Savannah are declared to be unlawful. The question propounded is therefore answered in the negative.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., absent on account of sickness.

KAY et al. v. BENSON. (No. 2434.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$ 237(2)—No reversal, in absence of prompt motion for mistrial.

If court erred in propounding questions to a witness, such error could not be complained of in the Supreme Court, where the injured party did not promptly move for a mistrial when the questions were propounded.

2. Trial  $\S$ 234(7), 244(3)—Charge held not to emphasize plaintiff's contentions, and shift burden from plaintiff to defendant.

A charge to the jury, "Fraud may not be presumed, but, being in itself subtle, slight circumstances may be sufficient to carry conviction of its existence," was not objectionable, on the ground that it emphasized the contentions of plaintiffs, and minimized evidence introduced by the defendants, and shifted the burden from the plaintiff to the defendants.

3. Trial  $\S$ 259(1)—Party desiring elaboration in charge should present request in writing.

A party desiring an elaboration of an instruction to more completely cover his contentions should duly present to the court a proper request in writing.

4. Evidence  $\S$ 113(8)—Report of receiver as to sale of property held admissible to show value.

Court did not err in admitting in evidence the report of a receiver, who under appointment of the court took charge of the subject-matter of the suit, such report showing the amount obtained at the sale of the receiver for said property, where court instructed that the amount of the sale by the receiver could only be considered as illustrating the value of the property at the time in question.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by H. S. Benson against L. S. Kay and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Weitner, Cheatham & Koplin and D. K. Johnston, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

W. S. Dillon, C. H. Calhoun, and W. J. Davis, Jr., all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. [1] 1. One ground of the motion for a new trial complains of questions propounded by the trial judge to a witness who, as notary public, had taken an affidavit of the defendant, as follows:

"Q. Did you tell these men about swearing to this affidavit that it was a mere matter of form? A. No.

"Q. Did you sign your name as notary public, that you had sworn a man, when you had not done so? A. I read that document to them.

"Q. You were appointed notary public by this court; is that the way you transact business? A. Very few would swear a man. At the same time I wrote this out myself. I wrote this out myself, and I read it to them word for word, and then they signed. Mr. David Kay was not present at the time. I don't know where he signed, or when he signed. They took the document with them when they signed there.

"Q. You are still notary public? A. Yes, sir."

The defendants should have promptly moved for a mistrial when the above questions were propounded, if they considered their interests prejudiced thereby, and a new trial will not be granted in the absence of such timely motion. Moore v. McAfee, 151 Ga. 270 (11), 275, 106 S. E. 276. Whether the questions amounted to reversible error, had defendants made a timely motion for a mistrial, need not be decided.

[2,3] 2. Another ground of the motion for a new trial complains that the court charged the jury as follows:

"Fraud may not be presumed, but, being in itself subtle, slight circumstances may be sufficient to carry conviction of its existence."

It is urged that this charge was not applicable to the nature of the testimony, that it was prejudicial to movants, in that it emphasized the contentions of respondents, and minimized the evidence introduced by movants, and that it shifted the burden from the plaintiff to the defendants. The charge is not subject to the criticism made. If defendants had desired an elaboration to more completely cover their contentions, a proper request in writing should have been duly presented to the court.

3. In other grounds of the motion for a new trial complaint is made that the court failed to charge the jury on designated principles of law. In the absence of a proper written request, duly presented, these grounds show no cause for the grant of a new trial.

[4] 4. In other grounds of the motion for a new trial complaint is made of the admission as evidence of the report of the receiver who, under appointment of the court, took charge of the business which was the subject-matter of the present suit, such report showing the amount obtained at the sale of the receiver for said property, and of the charge of the court to the jury in regard to such evidence. The charge complained of was as follows:

"The report of the auditor, I believe, was admitted in evidence here. The question as to the amount of the sale by the receiver can only be considered by you as illustrating, if it does, the value of the property at the time this purchase was made. You are not to consider what it was worth when the receiver sold it as a criterion for going by in this case; but you may consider the amount it brought, and the circumstances under which it was sold, in illustrating its value, if it does throw light on the subject of how much it was worth at the time that this alleged purchase was made. The condition of the goods and their value on the 1st of February, or whatever date it was, on which evidence was introduced, can only be considered by you as illustrating, if it does, its value when he is alleged to have purchased it in January, same date, which has been shown to you."

In the light of the charge, which was not erroneous, the court did not err in admitting the evidence.

5. The verdict was supported by evidence. Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., absent on account of sickness.

Criminal law §935(1)—Refusal of new trial proper where evidence authorized verdict.

No error of law is complained of as having been committed on the trial of the case, and only the usual general grounds are relied on. The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Harris County; Geo. P. Munro, Judge.

BRADFORD v. STATE. (No. 2609.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Criminal law §951(3, 4, 5)—No jurisdiction of motion for new trial made during vacation; ordinary motion must be made at trial term, and extraordinary motion at subsequent term.

Under the practice in this state, every motion for a new trial, whether ordinary or extraordinary, must be made during term. An ordinary motion must be made during the term at which the trial was had, and an extraordinary one may be made during a subsequent term. In this case an extraordinary motion for a new trial was made and filed in vacation; the judge heard it on its merits in vacation, and overruled it in vacation. The entire proceeding was nugatory. The judge erred in entertaining jurisdiction of the motion, and deciding it upon its merits. According to previous rulings of this court, his judgment must be reversed, with direction that the motion be dismissed. Perkins v. State, 126 Ga. 578, 55 S. E. 501, and cases cited.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; E. T. Shurley, Judge.

Will Bradford was convicted of crime, and brings error. Judgment denying new trial reversed, with directions to dismiss motion. See, also, 106 S. E. 718.

F. H. Colley, C. D. Colley and I. T. Irvin, Jr., all of Washington, Ga., and John R. Cooper, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

FLEEMAN v. GAY et al. (No. 2474.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Witnesses  $\Leftrightarrow$  150(3)—Statute prohibiting testimony to transactions with decedent inapplicable to suits instituted or defended by heirs at law.

The provisions of the Civil Code of 1910, § 5858, par. 1, to the effect that the opposite party in a suit instituted or defended by the personal representative of a deceased person shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor against the deceased person as to transactions or communications with such deceased person, has no reference to suits instituted or defended by the heirs at law of the deceased person. Therefore a surviving partner, against whom suit is brought by the heirs at law of the deceased partner, is not incompetent to testify as a witness in his own behalf to transactions between himself and such deceased partner. Boynton v. Reese, 112 Ga. 354 (3), 37 S. E. 437; Oliver v. Powell, 114 Ga. 592 (5), 40 S. E. 828; Whitley v. Hudson, 114 Ga. 668, 40 S. E. 838; Goddard v. Boyd, 144 Ga. 18, 85 S. E. 1013; Rudolph v. Washington, 146 Ga. 605, 91 S. E. 560; Hall v. Butler, 148 Ga. (2), 815, 98 S. E. 549.

2. Witnesses  $\Leftrightarrow$  150(3)—Partner may testify to transactions with deceased partner in action by heirs.

The provision of the Civil Code of 1910, § 5858, par. 2, that "where any suit is instituted or defended by partners, persons jointly liable or interested, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor as to transactions or communications solely with an insane or deceased partner, or person jointly liable or interested," has no application to a suit by the heirs at law of a deceased partner against a surviving partner. Compare Whitley v. Hudson, 114 Ga. 668 (2), 670, 40 S. E. 838.

3. Judgment reversed.

The court having erred in refusing to allow the surviving partner, who was defendant in the suit brought by the heirs at law of the deceased partner, to testify in his own behalf as to transactions between himself and the latter, and which evidence was material, a reversal of the judgment denying a new trial necessarily results.

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; J. B. Hutcheson, Judge.

King & Johnson, of Covington, for plaintiff in error.

A. S. Thurman, of Monticello, for defendants in error.

GILBERT, J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., absent on account of sickness.

HARRIS v. STATE. (No. 2586.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Dying statement properly admitted.

Under the ruling made in this case when it was before this court on a former review (see 149 Ga. 724, 102 S. E. 159), the court did not err in admitting as evidence the statement made by the deceased, which the state offered as a dying statement.

2. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  828 — Law as to mutual combat to be submitted without written request.

Where the law of mutual combat is essentially for consideration in the case, the charge of the court should submit it to the jury, even though no written request therefor is preferred.

3. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  1122(5) — Failure to instruct not reviewable where instructions not shown.

Whether the court erred in not charging the jury that "they could not consider the statement of the deceased in making their verdict, unless they found at the time of making such statement he had abandoned all hope of living," was error or not depends upon whether the court gave instructions to the jury in regard to the dying statement, and what those instructions were. The movant having failed to show what the court's instructions were upon this subject, the mere failure to charge in the language here set forth cannot be adjudged to show cause for the grant of a new trial.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Homicide  $\Leftrightarrow$  300(8)—Law of mutual combat held involved under evidence.

In a prosecution for homicide, held, that the law of mutual combat or mutual intention to fight was involved in the case, under the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Charlie Harris was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Len B. Gillebeau, of Atlanta, and W. H. Ennis, of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

M. S. Taylor, Sol. Gen., of Summerville, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Jas. F. Kelly, M. B. Eubanks, and F. W. Copeland, all of Rome, for the State.

BECK, P. J. The plaintiff in error, Charlie Harris, was indicted in Floyd superior court for the offense of murder. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. He made a motion for a new trial upon the general grounds, and thereafter filed an amendment to this motion, alleging as further ground for a new trial that the court failed to charge the law of voluntary manslaughter as based upon the theory of mutual combat or mutual intention to fight; and also that the judge erred in not charging the jury that they could not consider a statement of the deceased, introduced in evidence by the state, as a dying declaration, unless they believed that at the time this statement was made by the deceased every hope of life with him was extinct, the plaintiff in error contending that the deceased expressed in the statement itself a hope of life, and that the judge in his charge should have submitted to the jury the question of whether or not the expression used by the deceased in his statement amounted to a hope of life.

[1] 1. Under the ruling made in this case when it was here before (Harris v. State, 149 Ga. 724, 102 S. E. 159), the court did not err in admitting as evidence the statement made by the deceased, which the state offered as a dying statement.

[2] 2. In the second ground of the motion for a new trial, error is assigned upon the court's failure to charge the jury upon the law of voluntary manslaughter, as based upon the theory of mutual combat or mutual intent to fight. Whether the failure to charge upon this subject was error or not depends upon the question as to whether there was evidence from which the jury may have been authorized to find that there was mutual combat or mutual intention to fight. In the statement of the deceased, which was introduced by the state, we find the following:

"Q. Now just tell in your own way what he shot you with, and why he shot you. A. I wanted him to plow yesterday, and he would not plow; wanted to hire him to plow for me if he would not plow in his own crop, and he would not do that, and he would not feed the mules; and this morning I lacked a couple of hours being done a piece of land, and he came up before breakfast to plow, I guess, and had a pistol in his bosom, and I help him put a land slide on, and told him to go to plowing the other mule, and I would be done directly and he could have the other one also; and somebody turned the mule in the pasture, and he would not plow it.

"Q. What did you say to him, and he to you? A. And I went up on the hill to plow, and went around and came back and told Charlie to get the other mule and to go to plowing, and I would be done in a little while, and he could take both and go to plowing, and he said 'No,' that if he could not get both then he would not plow none; and I says, 'You are working for contrariness,' and he says, 'That's a lie'—he was not, and I threw a rock at him.

"Q. And then what? A. He ran his hand in his bosom and got his pistol out.

"Q. When he got the pistol out, what did you do? A. I ran around the mule, and my pistol was in my pocket, in a corduroy coat, and I tried to get it, and I ran around the mule twice, and he kept shooting as I came around, and I begged him to quit.

"Q. What did you have in your hand when he shot you? A. I was trying to get my gun.

"Q. Was your gun on your person? A. In my pocket.

"Q. And you had your coat on? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you shoot any? A. No; I didn't shoot.

"Q. How many times did the negro shoot? A. And the next time he shot I dropped my pistol, and he shot me through this arm, and I don't know what went with my pistol."

Isabel Spruce, a witness introduced by the defendant, testified in part as follows:

"When I came out Charlie was on his knees knocking on his plow, and when Mr. Pierce got near to him I heard them talking, and I did not pay them any attention until they spoke loud, and I turned around, and when I looked towards them Charlie was around the mule, and when he came around Mr. Pierce came around, and they both ran around the mule, one in front of the other; and Mr. Pierce grabbed at Charlie with his hand, and Charlie jumped back off him, and then Mr. Pierce threw up his hands as if he was going to shoot, and Charlie jumped back and threw his hands up, and when Charlie threw his hands down, and when he came up again he had his gun, and Mr. Pierce had his already. There were two shots as I remember, unless they both fired at once. When I seen them they were going around the mule the last time before the shooting. Mr. Pierce was after Charlie, and when he came around the mule he made at Charlie with his hand this way. When Charlie threw up his hands I could see he did not have anything in them; he just threw his hands up this way, when he jumped back off from Mr. Pierce, with his hands out open like this; when he had his hands up like that Mr. Pierce had something in his hand; looked like he had his gun pointing at Charlie that way, and Charlie threw his hands down, and when he came up he presented his gun, and they were talking all at the same time, but I could not understand them."

On cross-examination she testified:

"I did not say I didn't see the shooting. I said I heard the talking and turned around. It is true I testified that I looked around when they shot. I heard the shooting and I looked around, and they both looked like they were fixing to shoot; couldn't tell which shot first, and that's right unless they shot at the same time."

And then, in answer to a question as to her testimony at the coroner's inquest, she said:

"I do not remember that the question was asked me at the coroner's inquest, 'The shooting occurred at the plow where Mr. Pierce was plowing?' and that I answered, 'Yes, sir; when I looked around they both brought their hands up that way.' Charles threw his hands up, and I said that when Mr. Pierce grabbed at Charlie, and Charlie jumped back from him, they both threw their hands up to shoot, after Charlie threw his hands up and come down. Mr. Pierce had his already up.

"Q. Wasn't this question asked you on that hearing: 'Did you see a pistol in Mr. Pierce's hand?' and you answered, 'No, sir.' A. I said I couldn't tell whether it was a pistol, but he had it up like it was a pistol. I suppose I answered, 'It was too far for me to see; I couldn't tell; he had a pistol, though, for they went out and got Mr. Pierce's pistol afterwards. I couldn't see the pistol from my house, and couldn't tell what either had in their hands.'"

[4] Under this evidence the law of mutual combat or mutual intention to fight was involved in the case. See Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67; Findley v. State, 125 Ga. 579, 583, 54 S. E. 106; Matthews v. State, 136 Ga. 125, 70 S. E. 1110. The law of mutual combat being involved in the case, instructions upon that subject should have been given by the court, although no written request therefor was preferred. In the case of Waller v. State, 100 Ga. 320, 28 S. E. 77, it was held:

"There being, on the trial of an indictment for murder, evidence which, if credible, would have warranted a finding that the slayer and the deceased, upon a sudden quarrel, each being armed with a deadly weapon, mutually engaged in a mortal combat, each using his weapon and intending to kill the other therewith, it was the duty of the judge, with or without a request, to give in charge to the jury the law of voluntary manslaughter as related to the doctrine of 'mutual combat'; and the omission to do so is cause for a new trial, where the accused was convicted of murder."

In Findley v. State, supra, this court said:

"The evidence in this case involved the question of whether or not there was such a mutual combat at the time of the homicide as to reduce the killing from murder to manslaughter. The court omitted entirely any reference to that subject, though charging generally on the subject of manslaughter."

See, also, Ray v. State, 15 Ga. 223; Butt v. State, 150 Ga. 302, 103 S. E. 466. In the instant case the judge failed to charge upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter as based upon the law of mutual combat; and this was such error as requires the grant of a new trial.

HOLLIS v. STATE. (No. 2420.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Constitutional law § 83(3)—False pretenses § 2—Act making overdraw of bank account a crime not unconstitutional, as constituting imprisonment for debt.

Laws 1919, p. 220, § 34, making it a crime to overdraw a bank account, or to utter or deliver an instrument overdrawing an account or credit, is not unconstitutional, as violative of Const. art. 1, § 1, par. 21, prohibiting imprisonment for debt; such statute providing for the punishment of persons practicing the fraud specified therein.

2. Witnesses § 37(2)—One without personal knowledge cannot testify as to facts shown by books.

A person could not testify as to what was shown by records of deposits taken from the proper custodian of the books of a bank, where he did not know of his own knowledge anything about the matter and did not keep the books of the bank.

3. Criminal law § 444—Record of bank improperly admitted in evidence.

In a prosecution for overdrawing an account at a bank, court erred in admitting in evidence a sheet received from the proper custodian of the books of the bank, where it was not shown who kept the books, or that they were correctly kept.

4. False pretenses § 41—Evidence properly excluded as immaterial.

In a prosecution for overdrawing a bank account, where a witness for the defendant was asked by his counsel the question, "Did you during the month of June, 1920, give any checks on the Bank of T. and sign the name of [the defendant] to them?" and counsel informed the court that the witness would answer, "I did," the court properly refused to permit the answer to the question, since the answer "I did," without more, would have been immaterial.

Error from City Court of Tifton; James H. Price, Judge.

W. A. Hollis was convicted of drawing a check on a bank without sufficient funds or credit for its payment, and brings error. Reversed.

H. H. Hargrett and W. B. Bennet, both of Tifton, for plaintiff in error.

R. E. Dinsmore, Sol., of Tifton, for the State.

FISH, C. J. [1] 1. Section 34 of article 20 of the act of the General Assembly entitled "An act to regulate banking in the state of Georgia," etc., approved August 16, 1919 (Georgia Laws 1919, pp. 135, 220), provides:

"Any person who, with intent to defraud, shall make, or draw, or utter, or deliver any check, draft, or order for the payment of money upon any bank, or other depository knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering or delivery that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank, or other depository, for the payment of such check, draft or order in full upon its presentation, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The making, drawing, uttering, or delivering of such check, draft, or order as aforesaid shall be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud. The word 'credit' as used herein shall be construed to mean an arrangement or understanding with the bank or depository for the payment of such check, draft or order." Section 24.

This section of the act is not unconstitutional, as violative of article 1, section 1, paragraph 21, of the Constitution of this state, which prohibits imprisonment for debt. The section is not designed for punishment for mere nonpayment of debts, but provides for the punishment of persons practicing the fraud specified therein. See Smith v. State, 141 Ga. 482, 81 S. E. 220, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 999.

[2] 2. The defendant was charged in an accusation preferred against him in the city court of Tifton, on August 28, 1920, with a violation of the section of the act quoted in the foregoing note, in that he, on June 4, 1920, with intent to defraud, drew a check on the Bank of Tifton, for a certain sum of money, in favor of a designated person (a copy of the check being set out in the accusation), and delivered the same to the payee, knowing at the time the check was drawn and delivered that he did not have sufficient funds in or credit with such bank for its payment. On the trial the defendant was convicted. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted. A ground of the motion for a new trial complains that the court erred in holding, over defendant's objection, the following evidence of a witness for the state to be admissible:

"This sheet [indicating instrument attached to this brief and marked Exhibit B] came from the proper custodian of the books in the Bank of Tifton. It is the individual deposit sheet of [the defendant]. It shows that [the defendant] had a balance of 70 cents in the bank on April 1, 1920, and had made no deposit there since that time. He might have made a deposit in some other name, but if he had made it in his own name it would have shown on this sheet. I cannot swear positively that he had made no deposit since April 1, 1920, but this sheet does not show that he did."

This ground of the motion states that the witness had testified "that he did not keep the books of the Bank of Tifton"; the objection urged to the admissibility of the testimony being that "it was secondary evidence, it not having been shown that the witness knew of his own knowledge anything about the matter." The "sheet" attached as an exhibit to the motion appears to be a deposit account kept by the defendant with the Bank of Tifton, showing various items of deposit by the defendant, and various checks drawn by him, stating the dates of the month and the amounts of each deposit and each check from January 5, to April 10, but not designating any year. Held, that the court erred in not excluding the testimony on the objection made.

[3] 3. The court also erred in admitting in evidence against the defendant the "sheet or written instrument referred to in the next preceding note; the evidence being objected to on the ground that" it was not properly identified, because it was not shown who kept the books, nor that they were correctly kept.

[4] 4. A witness for the defendant was asked by his counsel the following question:

"Did you during the month of June, 1920, give any checks on the Bank of Tifton and sign the name of [the defendant] to them?"

Counsel informed the court that the witness would answer, "I did." The court refused to permit the answer to the question. The answer, "I did," without more, would have been immaterial, and the court did not err in excluding it.

5. As a new trial is granted on other grounds, a ruling as to the alleged newly discovered evidence is not required.

6. The court erred in not granting a new trial on the grounds dealt with in the foregoing notes numbers 2 and 3.

Judgment reversed.

JACKSON v. STATE. (No. 2673.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §1039—Verdict not set aside on ground that person acting as bailiff was not officer where no objection.

If one who had been a constable of a certain militia district in a given county by removal therefrom to another district thereby vacated his office, nevertheless if, while in attendance upon the superior court of that county, he was selected by the sheriff to act as bailiff during the term of court, and while acting in that capacity had charge of a jury after a case had been submitted to them, no objection being made to his acting in that capacity, the verdict made by the jury will not be set aside upon the ground that the jury were in charge of one who was not in fact a constable of the county.

2. Criminal law §956(13)—Statement of bailiff held to sufficiently explain charge that he mingled with jury.

The contention that the bailiff while in charge of the jury mingled with them and slept in the same room with them, while they were deliberating in the case, was sufficiently met and explained.

3. Criminal law §956(13)—Negative testimony on motion for new trial did not require finding that bailiff was not sworn.

The mere negative testimony of the bailiff himself that he had no recollection of taking the oath prescribed in section 888 of the Penal Code of 1910, relating to oaths of bailiffs, and of others who were present a part of the time in the courtroom that they had no recollection of seeing him sworn, did not require a finding upon the part of the trial judge, as a matter of fact, that the bailiff did not take the oath prescribed. Nor would the additional fact that there was no record upon the minutes of the court of the bailiff's having been sworn require such a finding.

4. Criminal law  $\S$  761(12), 762(1)—Charge on motive held not objectionable as assuming facts or expressing opinion.

The exception to the charge upon the ground that it contained an expression of opinion by the court is without merit.

5. Homicide  $\S$  304, 309(5)—Evidence held not to warrant charge upon involuntary manslaughter or accidental shooting.

There was no evidence upon which to predicate a charge upon the subject of involuntary manslaughter or upon the theory of accidental shooting.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. Criminal law  $\S$  1160—Credibility of bailiff's statement that he did not mingle with jury matter for trial judge.

Where it was contended in a homicide case that the bailiff mingled with and talked to jurors while considering the case, the trial court was the judge of the credibility of a statement of the bailiff in an affidavit on motion for new trial that he did not mingle with or talk to the jurors while they were considering the case.

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; R. Eve, Judge.

Joe Jackson was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Perry & Miller, of Sylvester, for plaintiff in error.

R. S. Foy, Sol. Gen., of Sylvester, Geo. M. Napier, Atty. Gen., and Seward M. Smith, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Joe Jackson was tried under an indictment charging him with the offense of murder. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, without a recommendation. The accused made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. Certain of the grounds of the motion for a new trial relate to misconduct upon the part of the bailiff in charge of the jury while it was in his charge, after the case had been submitted to them; and, in addition to the alleged acts of misconduct upon his part, it is charged in the motion that the bailiff was not sworn; also that he was not a legal constable of the county.

[1] 1. The bailiff referred to, Hiram Stewart, had been a bailiff in a certain militia district in the county, but had removed therefrom. If by his removal from the district his office was vacated and he was no longer a constable of the county, nevertheless, if, during the term of court at which the accused was tried, he was selected by the sheriff as a bailiff and acted as such, he was a de facto officer, and the fact that he was placed in charge of the jury is not ground for setting aside the verdict, especially as no objection was made to his acting as bailiff and performing the duties of such an officer.

[2] 2. The contention that the bailiff improperly mingled with the jury and conversed with them, and allowed another constable to come into the room where the bailiff was, was sufficiently met and explained by the following statement of the bailiff to whom the improper conduct is imputed:

"That he is the person who served as bailiff of the superior court of Worth county, and as such bailiff had charge of the jury which tried the case of The State v. Joe Jackson, charged with murder, at the January adjourned term, 1921; that he has seen the affidavit of S. A. Powell, in which it is stated in substance that affiant slept in the jury room with said jury while they were considering said case. Deponent says the facts are as follows: The case above mentioned was submitted to the jury after arguments of counsel and charge of the court had been concluded, in the afternoon of a day during said term, and said jury then placed in charge of deponent as bailiff of said court. Said jury went immediately to the jury room used by trial juries for deliberations upon cases in said court, the regular jury room, where they remained until 7 or 8 o'clock, p. m., when they were by deponent, in obedience to the direction of the court, carried to the café, after supper had been prepared for them, when and where they ate supper, separated from other persons, and after having eaten their supper were by deponent immediately taken back to the jury room, where they remained an hour or two after supper; and, not having arrived at a verdict in the case, deponent, by direction of the court, carried them to the room in the courthouse prepared for trial juries to sleep in, where they slept during the night. The weather was cool, and fire was needed in their bedroom, and the said S. A. Powell was asked by deponent to carry a turn of wood into the jury bedroom for making a fire, when said Powell and deponent each took therein a turn of wood, and said Powell went immediately out of said room, and did not speak to the jury nor to any member of the jury. Deponent prepared a fire for the comfort of the jury, and occupied a cot prepared for the purpose, which cot obstructed the only door or place of entrance or exit in or from said room. Deponent did not converse with said jury, nor did any other person during the time they were in charge of deponent, nor within his knowledge. Deponent did not mix or mingle or converse or speak with said jury, nor with any member of said jury, except under direction of the court, and said jury did not discuss said case nor any feature of said case in the presence of deponent, nor was said case nor any feature of it mentioned by deponent, nor by any one else in the presence of said jury, nor by any member of said jury. That deponent did escort said jury, while in his charge, across the courthouse grounds into the streets, down the street to the café, and not the hotel, and back to the jury room, but did so as above stated in obedience to the direction of the court, and for the purpose of said jury getting their meals. And at no time did they mix and mingle with other persons further than was necessary in passing and meeting such persons upon the streets and café, and never at any time did said jury or any member mix and mingle with other persons, further than stated above, and did not discuss said case either among themselves out of the jury room nor in the presence of deponent, nor in the presence of any other person, nor did any other persons mention said case or any feature of said case in the presence or hearing of said jury."

[8] The court was the judge of the credibility of the affiant's statement, and evidently found it to be true. That being so, this court cannot disturb his finding; and the ground of the motion for new trial based upon misconduct of the bailiff and the jury cannot avail the plaintiff in error in the face of the judge's finding.

[3] 3. Failure of a bailiff to take the oath prescribed in section 883 of the Penal Code of 1910, relating to oaths of bailiffs taking charge of juries, is ground for the grant of a new trial. Roberts v. State, 72 Ga. 673; Washington v. State, 138 Ga. 370, 75 S. E. 253. But, where bailiffs take charge of juries, there is a presumption that they were regularly sworn; and the mere negative testimony of the bailiff himself that he had no recollection of taking the oath, and of others who were present a part of the time in the courtroom that they had no recollection of seeing him sworn, will not require a finding upon the part of the judge, when the question of whether the bailiff was sworn or not is raised in the motion for a new trial, that the bailiff was not sworn. Nor will the fact that there was no record upon the minutes of the court of the oath having been taken by the bailiff, in addition to such negative testimony, require a finding that he was not sworn. Especially is this true where such negative affidavit of the bailiff is taken quite a while after adjournment of the court.

[4] 4. In the trial of the case the judge charged the jury as follows:

"I charge you, as a principle of law for your consideration in this case, that motive or intention is essential to malice, and malice is an essential ingredient of the offense of murder. As before stating, intention is to be arrived at by such proof of the surrounding circumstances connected with the perpetration of the offense and the sound mind and discretion of the person accused. You inquire whether there was any motive on the part of the defendant to induce him to take the life of the deceased, and, if there was any motive, what that motive was. If you find there was no motive on his part to commit the act, you may consider it, especially if the evidence leave the defendant's guilt at all doubtful, in deciding whether the defendant is guilty or not."

This charge is excepted to upon the ground that "it assumed that the defendant took the life of the deceased." Fairly construed, the charge is not open to this exception.

[5] 5. Several witnesses testified directly and positively that the accused shot the deceased. No witness testified to any circumstance tending to show that the shooting was unintentional or that it was accidental. The accused himself in his statement claimed that he was not present at the scene of the shooting; that he had left the house in which the killing took place, and had gone away from the scene of the homicide. Manifestly the court did not err in not charging the jury upon the theory of accidental shooting or the law of involuntary manslaughter.

THWEATT v. STATE. (No. 2704.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$ 413(1), 695(6) — Declarations of accused held not admissible as self-serving; evidence properly excluded, where part is objectionable.

The court did not err in excluding from evidence certain declarations, made by the accused, that a short time before the homicide and a short distance from the scene thereof the witness met the accused, while the latter was on his way to the home of the deceased, where the killing took place, and that the accused stated to him in part that he had his pistol with him, having put it in his pocket the night before, when the deceased drove him from the home, as he knew that he would have to roam the streets for the remainder of the night, but that now he had no further use for the pistol.

(a) If other parts of the statement made by the accused to the witness at the same time were admissible, they should have been separated from the objectionable part and offered separately. Where evidence is offered in block, and a part of it is objectionable, the ruling of the court excluding it in its entirety will not be cause for a new trial.

2. Homicide  $\S$ 285—Court properly instructed on threats.

The court did not err in instructing the jury upon the subject of threats, and in submitting to them the question of whether threats had been made or not, as a circumstance to be considered by them. There was some evidence authorizing the charge.

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 782(6)—Charge on positive and negative evidence held not erroneous.

The court charged the jury in part as follows: "Now, gentlemen, the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is rather to be believed than that such fact did not exist, because many witnesses who had the same opportunity of observation swear that they did not see or know of its having transpired. This does not apply when two parties have equal facilities for seeing or hearing a thing, and one swears that it did and the other swears that it did not." And the court added: "With reference to this question of positive and negative testimony, the jury, weighing the testimony of such witnesses, should consider and pass upon the question of their credibility." In view of the fact that the court submitted the credibility of witnesses to the jury, the charge as given was not error.

4. Instructions.

Under the evidence in the case the court did not err in failing to charge the law of voluntary manslaughter.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 828—Request in writing necessary to require charge on theory presented by statement alone.

Failure of court to charge on a theory of the case presented by statement alone is not error, where no request in writing is made therefor.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; Geo. P. Munro, Judge.

Clarence Thweatt was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Love & Fort, of Columbus, for plaintiff in error.

C. F. McLaughlin; Sol. Gen., and T. T. Miller, both of Columbus, Geo. M. Napier, Atty. Gen., and Seward M. Smith, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Upon the trial of Clarence Thweatt, under an indictment charging him with the offense of murder, a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, was returned, whereupon he made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he accepted.

[1] 1. While one Jones, who was a witness for the defendant, was upon the stand under examination, counsel for the defendant proposed to prove by him the following facts:

"That on the same morning of the fatal encounter between the defendant and the deceased, the witness, Jimmie Jones, met defendant, Clarence Thweatt on the corner of Tenth and Front streets, in Columbus, three blocks from the scene of the homicide, and while Clarence Thweatt was on his way to the home of the deceased; that the defendant then and there told Jimmie Jones that he and his father-in-law

[the deceased] had had a difficulty the night before, and he [defendant] was going back to the home to apologize to him, and to ask his permission to take his [defendant's] wife and child away from there, and take them to the home of the witness, where he had provided a place for them, Jimmie Jones having rented to defendant quarters in which to place his family; that defendant then and there told Jimmie Jones that, if the deceased did not quietly consent for him to take his wife and child away, he intended to grab up his baby and take it away, and that he knew his wife would follow; that at that same time and same place the defendant offered to surrender to Jimmie Jones his pistol, and asked him to take it and take care of it for him; that he had put it in his pocket the night before, when deceased drove him from the home, as he knew that he would have to roam the streets the remainder of the night; and then and there told the witness that he [defendant] had no further use for it."

It is alleged that, if the witness had been allowed to answer the questions propounded, he would have testified to the facts as set forth immediately above, and error is assigned upon the exclusion of this testimony. There was no error in this ruling of the court. Parts of the testimony thus excluded were clearly self-serving declarations, and were not admissible upon the theory that they were part of the res gestæ. If any part of the testimony was admissible, it should have been separated from that which was objectionable, and offered in evidence.

[2] 2. The ruling made in the second head-note requires no elaboration.

[3] 3. In the course of his instructions to the jury the court gave the following charge:

"Now, gentlemen, the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is rather to be believed than that such fact did not exist, because many witnesses who had the same opportunity of observation swear that they did not see or know of its having transpired. This does not apply when two parties have equal facilities for seeing or hearing a thing, and one swears that it did and the other swears that it did not. With reference to this question of positive and negative testimony, the jury, in weighing the testimony of such witnesses, should consider and pass upon the question of their credibility."

Plaintiff in error contends that this charge was error:

"Because it failed to place upon the instructions the vital and absolutely necessary qualification that the jury must not only believe that the witness had the same opportunity of observation, but must also be of equal credibility."

In the case of Warrick v. State, 125 Ga. 133, 53 S. E. 1027, it was said:

"Where the evidence is conflicting as to whether a particular thing did or did not occur, and the presiding judge charges the jury the legal principle that the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is rather to be believed than that such fact did not exist, because many witnesses who had the same opportunity of observation swear that they did not see or know of its having transpired, he should also give an instruction to the effect that in weighing the testimony of witnesses the jury should consider and pass upon their credibility."

The same rule is stated and affirmed in several other decisions by this court. See, also, the case of Helms v. State, 136 Ga. 799, 72 S. E. 246, where it is said:

"It is erroneous to charge Penal Code 1910, § 1011, that 'the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is rather to be believed than that such fact did not exist, because many witnesses who had the same opportunity of observation swear that they did not see or know of its having transpired,' without an instruction, in connection therewith, touching the credibility of witnesses."

There are cases in our reports to be found where the judgment of the trial court refusing a new trial was reversed because in his charge the judge had instructed the jury that the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is rather to be believed than that such fact did not exist, because many witnesses who had the same opportunity of observation swear that they did not see or know of its having transpired, and did not charge in connection therewith touching the credibility of witnesses. But in the present case the court, after charging the jury in the language which the plaintiff in error contends is objectionable, added:

"With reference to this question of positive and negative testimony, the jury weighing the testimony of such witnesses should consider and pass upon the question of their credibility."

And it seems that this was sufficient submission to the jury of the question of credibility, and therefore the charge complained of was not error.

There were other criticisms upon the verbiage of the charge, which are not of sufficient importance to merit discussion.

[4, §] 4. Under the evidence in the case the court did not err in failing to charge the law of voluntary manslaughter. If a charge upon that subject was authorized at all, it was under the statement of the accused; and the failure to charge upon a theory of the case presented by the statement alone is not error, where no request in writing is made therefor.

Judgment affirmed.

GIDDENS v. STATE. (No. 2571.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Indictment and information ¶10, 133(3)—
Mere omission of name of 1 of 18 grand jurors formal error which could be taken advantage of only by special demurrer.

While it is necessary that as many as 18 grand jurors act in returning an indictment, the fact that only 17 names are entered in the face of the indictment is not such a fatal defect in the indictment as to render it void; nor is it a good ground for a motion in arrest. If as a matter of fact only 17 did act in returning the indictment, a plea in abatement should have been filed. The mere omission of 1 of the 18 names should be taken advantage of by special demurrer attacking the indictment for defect in form.

2. Homicide ¶169(2) — Competent to show officer killed was informed by telephone of existence of warrant, which then could be admitted.

Where a constable, without a warrant, attempted to make an arrest of a named person, and the latter resisted, and shot and killed the officer, it is competent to show, upon the trial of the slayer, that the officer had inquired of the sheriff of the county by telephone whether he had a warrant for the arrest of the person whom he afterwards sought to apprehend, and the sheriff replied that he had, and told the constable making the inquiry to arrest the person referred to and to carry him to a designated place, and that he would come after him.

(a) The conversation having been admitted, it was competent to show the existence of the warrant by introducing that document in evidence.

3. Homicide ¶287 — Instruction concerning consideration by jury of motive held proper.

The court did not err in instructing the jury that they might consider the question as to whether motive had been shown, and what that motive was, if any motive was shown by the evidence; and if no motive was shown, that the jury might consider the lack of motive; but that if the evidence satisfied them beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the crime charged with malice aforethought, either express or implied, then, though no motive was disclosed by the evidence, the jury would be authorized to infer an unlawful motive and to find the defendant guilty.

4. Homicide ¶300(9)—Instruction upon subject of arrest without warrant held not proper under evidence.

Under the evidence in this case the court should not have charged the jury the provisions of section 917, Penal Code 1910, upon the subject of arrests without a warrant, as applicable to the evidence, there being no evidence in the case to show that the offense for which the officer sought to make the arrest had been committed in his presence, or that the offender was endeavoring to escape, or for other cause there was likely to be a failure of justice.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Indictment and Information  $\S$  147—Omission of name of grand juror ground for quashing on demurrer.

Where only the names of 17 of the 18 grand jurors acting in returning it appeared on the face of an indictment, there was such a defect in form that upon special demurrer the court would have quashed the indictment, so that one perfect in form might be returned.

6. Arrest  $\S$  83(1)—Rule as to arrest without warrant.

An arrest cannot lawfully be made without a warrant where the offense is not committed in the presence of the officer, unless the offender is endeavoring to escape, or for other cause there is likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant; but the mere possibility of there being a failure of justice does not authorize an officer to attempt an arrest for a misdemeanor without a warrant.

7. Homicide  $\S$  340(2)—Charge in homicide case concerning arrest held prejudicial.

In a prosecution for murder of an officer while attempting to make an arrest, a charge which gave the jury the authority to decide that the arrest would have been legal without a warrant was prejudicial as well as erroneous, where there was no evidence showing conditions warranting such arrest.

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; R. Eve, Judge.

Macie Giddens was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Tipton, of Sylvester, for plaintiff in error.

R. S. Foy, Sol. Gen., and Williamson & Williamson, all of Sylvester, and R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Macie Giddens was tried under an indictment charging him with the offense of murder; it being alleged that he had killed one W. P. Giddens. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, which being overruled, he excepted.

[1.] 1. Before judgment and sentence of the court was pronounced and entered against the accused, his counsel presented to the court in writing his motion in arrest of judgment and sentence, which was filed, and a rule nisi was issued, directed to the Solicitor General with the usual order. The motion in arrest was based upon the ground that only 17 jurors constituted the grand jury which returned the indictment in this case, only 17 names appearing in the face of the indictment. The court upon the hearing of this motion permitted evidence to be introduced to show that there were 18 jurors who acted as such in returning the indictment, and that the omission of the name of one of them was a clerical mistake; and the motion was overruled.

The court did not err in overruling the motion. We do not think that the defect in the indictment here pointed out could be raised by a motion in arrest. The defendant might have demurred to the indictment upon the defect appearing on the face of it, or possibly he might have filed a plea in abatement. If as many as 18 grand jurors actually participated in the deliberations of the charge against the accused and took part in returning the indictment, the indictment was good after verdict, and was not rendered void by the clerical omission of one of the names. It was such a defect in form, however, that upon demurrer the court would have quashed the indictment, so that one perfect in form might be returned. The decision in the case of Williams v. State, 107 Ga. 721, 83 S. E. 648, is conclusive upon the question here decided. See, also, the case of Hamilton v. State, 97 Ga. 216, 23 S. E. 824.

[2.] 2. The conversation referred to in the second headnote tended to explain why the constable was at the place where the homicide was committed, to show his motive in going there, and to explain the conduct of the deceased officer. Similar evidence was held to be admissible in the case of Price v. State, 72 Ga. 441, upon the ground that the statements there admitted were a part of the act of going, of the res gestæ. And in the instant case the jury were distinctly instructed as to the limited purpose for which the evidence was admitted; that is, that it was admitted to explain why the deceased was present at the home of the defendant on the night of the encounter. The conversation having been admitted, it was competent to show the existence of the warrants, by introducing those documents in evidence.

[3.] 3. The court charged the jury as follows:

"You may inquire whether there was any motive on the part of the defendant to induce him to take the life of the deceased, and, if there was any motive, what that motive was. If you find there was no motive on his part to commit the act, you may consider it, especially if the evidence leaves the defendant's guilt at all doubtful, in determining whether the defendant is guilty or not. Yet, if the evidence shows the commission of the crime, and you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed it with malice aforethought, either express or implied, and if the circumstances are consistent with his guilt and inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt, then, though the evidence may not disclose a motive, you would be authorized to infer an unlawful motive and find the defendant guilty."

This charge is not open to criticism upon the ground that it is confusing and liable to be misunderstood by the jury, and probably was misunderstood, to the injury of the defendant; nor that it was calculated to mislead the jury; nor that the entire charge upon the subject of motive greatly modified the rule on that subject; nor on the ground that it was not authorized by the evidence.

[4, 6] 4. Error is assigned upon the following charge of the court:

"It is not claimed by the state in this case that the deceased was, at the time he was shot, in possession of a warrant for the arrest of Macie Giddens. It does contend, however, that under the conditions and circumstances existing at the time the jury would be authorized to find that the defendant, Macie Giddens, was a fugitive from justice, and was endeavoring to escape, or for other cause there was likely to be a miscarriage of justice, and that W. P. Giddens, the deceased, was an officer of the state, and therefore authorized to make an arrest without a warrant. Section 917 of the Code of Georgia relating to the subject of arrest I will now read to you: 'An arrest may be made for a crime by an officer, either under a warrant, or without a warrant if the offense is committed in his presence, or the offender is endeavoring to escape, or for other cause there is likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant.'"

This charge is excepted to upon the ground that it was not authorized by the evidence. We are of the opinion that the exception to the charge points out a radical and material error. We find no evidence in the case from which the jury would have been authorized to find that the defendant was endeavoring to escape, and the expression used by the court, "fugitive from justice," must be taken in this connection to mean one who is endeavoring to escape. And it is not contended that the offense was committed in the presence of the officer, nor was it likely for any other cause that there would be a miscarriage of justice. Two indictments for misdemeanor had been found by the grand jury of the county against the defendant, some two months before the homicide, and bench warrants had been issued and were at the time of the killing in the hands of the sheriff of the county. There is some evidence that the defendant had left the county, but it does not appear that he had fled to escape arrest under the bench warrants. It seems that he had gone for a while to Americus, Georgia, which is only a short distance from the county of Worth; and several days before the attempted arrest he had returned to Worth county and was staying at his mother's, to whose house certain of his property and effects had been carried. There is no ground upon which it could be contended that the sheriff, who was at the county site, and who, it seems, possessed an automobile or had one at his command, could not have gone from the county site to the place at which the accused was staying, or that he could not have sent the warrant to the officer who endeavored to make the arrest, in the course of two or three hours. An arrest cannot lawfully be made without a warrant, where the offense is not committed in the presence of the officer, unless the offender is endeavoring to escape, "or for other cause there is likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant." There could be no failure of justice in this case for want of an officer to issue a warrant. The warrant had already been issued. Nor was it likely that there would be a failure of justice because of any delay in obtaining this warrant. The mere possibility of there being a failure of justice does not authorize an officer to attempt an arrest for a misdemeanor without a warrant. The expression of the law is "likely to be a failure of justice"; that is, probable ground for believing that there will be a failure of justice. Under these facts and circumstances, the court was not authorized under the law to submit to the jury the question as to whether or not the deceased could legally proceed without a warrant to go to the house of the accused, break open the door, and attempt to make an arrest.

[7] Counsel for the state argue that, conceding for the sake of argument the excerpt from the court's charge was not properly adjusted to the facts of this case, it does not appear that the charge was harmful to the defendant. We cannot agree to this contention. It was this charge and other portions of the charge similar in effect which gave to the jury the authority to decide that the arrest would have been legal without a warrant. If we are right in holding that the charge was erroneous, we have no doubt that it was material error and harmful to the accused. What we have said in regard to this particular part of the charge is applicable to other portions of the charge complained of, which could only be proper upon the assumption that there was some evidence to authorize the finding that the circumstances justified an arrest without a warrant.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., absent on account of sickness.

CROWELL et al. v. AKIN et al. (No. 2323.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. Constitutional law  $\Leftrightarrow$  306—Records  $\Leftrightarrow$  2—Land registration act not violative of due process of law provisions.

The sixteenth section of the act of the General Assembly approved August 21, 1917 (Acts 1917, p. 108), known as the land registration act, is not violative of the due process of law clauses of the state and federal Constitutions (Const. U. S. Amend. 14 and Const. Ga. art. 1, § 1, par. 3 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6359]), in that the preliminary examination by the examiner is ex parte and before the parties adversely interested are brought into the proceeding, or in that the preliminary report of the examiner is declared to be "prima facie evidence of the contents thereof," such report not being binding upon the court or conclusive upon the parties adversely interested in the proceeding. The intent of the preliminary report is to furnish to the court and to the parties any information likely to affect the title or the possession, and so that any person interested in or likely to be interested in the result of the suit may be notified. Nor is section 20 of the act violative of the due process of law clauses of the state and federal Constitutions, upon the ground that the section provides for the independent examination of the title by the examiner and for the submission by him of a final report based upon such findings which shall be taken as prima facie true; such report not being conclusive upon the parties, nor binding upon the court until after trial by jury upon exceptions of fact filed thereto.

2. Jury  $\Leftrightarrow$  19(1)—Land registration act does not deny right of trial by jury.

The act is not violative of the guaranty of the state Constitution (article 6, § 18, par. 1 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6545]) that "the right of trial by jury * * * shall remain inviolate;" the act (Acts 1917, p. 108) and the twentieth section thereof expressly providing for trial by jury as a matter of right, upon demand, upon any issues of fact arising upon exceptions to the auditor's report filed by any party to the proceeding. The provisions of the act relating to the trial by jury upon demand of issues of fact arising upon exceptions to the examiner's report, which is to be taken as prima facie true, and restricting the hearing to the evidence reported by the examiner (except as otherwise provided in the act) are not unconstitutional limitations of the right of trial by jury.

3. Jury  $\Leftrightarrow$  19(1)—Land registration act not unconstitutional as permitting judgment without verdict of jury.

The act is not unconstitutional because it confers upon the judge of the superior court the right to render judgment without the verdict of a jury in a civil case other than one founded on an unconditional contract in writing where no issuable defense is filed on oath.

4. Statutes  $\Leftrightarrow$  107(1), 115(2)—Land registration act not violative of constitutional provision as to title and subjects.

The act is not violative of article 3, § 7, par. 8, of the Constitution of this state (Civ. Code 1910, § 6437), which declares: "No law or ordinance shall pass which refers to more than one subject-matter, or contains matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof."

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)*5. Records  $\Leftrightarrow$  2—Land registration act liberally construed.

The land registration act (Acts 1917, p. 108) is a remedial statute, and should be liberally construed according to its intent so as to advance the remedy and repress the evil.

6. Jury  $\Leftrightarrow$  10—Cases triable without.

All cases triable without a jury prior to the adoption of the Constitution may still be so tried, and it is competent for the Legislature to provide for a trial without a jury in cases similar to those in which such a trial was in use prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

Error from Superior Court, Wayne County; J. P. Highsmith, Judge.

Action by T. R. C. Crowell and others against L. R. Akin and others under the land registration act. From judgment for defendants plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

J. L. Sweat, of Waycross, and A. G. Powell, of Atlanta, amici curiae.

Bennet, Twitty & Reese and C. B. Conyers, all of Brunswick, Walter McElreath, of Atlanta, D. M. Clark, Jas. R. Thomas, R. L. Bennett, Gibbs & Turner, all of Jesup, and J. C. McDonald and Wilson & Bennett, all of Waycross, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. On April 13, 1920, Thatcher R. C. Crowell, Calvin D. Christ, and Calvin C. Walkling filed their petition in Wayne superior court, to have their title to 72 tracts of land, containing 1,000 acres each, more or less, and eight lots containing 490 acres each, more or less, as therein described, situated, lying, and being in Wayne county, Ga., and known as "the Williams survey lands," registered under the land registration act. The defendants named in the proceeding, together with all parties in possession over 14 years of age, were served by the sheriff or his deputy, and the lands were duly posted by the sheriff. Copies of the petition and process were mailed by the clerk to all nonresident adverse claimants, and notice of the proceeding was duly published "to all whom it may concern," as provided in the act. The time within which adverse claimants might appear and assert their claims was enlarged from time to time by proper orders of the court, and had not expired when, on August 23, 1920, L. R. Akin and 35 other persons filed in Wayne superior court their petition against the applicants in the registration proceeding, to enjoin that proceeding, upon the ground that the land registration act is unconstitutional for the reasons set forth in their petition. The petition for injunction alleged that each of the plaintiffs "is in possession of some part of the vast acreage involved in said petition for registration, and claims title thereto adversely to the claim of title asserted by the defendants herein." To the petition for injunction the defendants demurred and answered. Upon the interlocutory hearing the court took the matter under advisement, and subsequently, on October 21, 1920, passed an order granting the injunction as prayed. To this judgment the defendants excepted. The bill of exceptions recites:

"Upon the hearing, it was admitted upon the part of the plaintiffs in the petition for injunction, that, if the land registration act was constitutional, then plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction."

The plaintiffs' contentions, as summarized in the brief of counsel filed in their behalf, and in the order in which we will consider them, are:

"(1) The scheme of the act, with reference to the examiner's preliminary report and the findings of fact incorporated therein, is violative of the 'due process of law' provisions of the state and United States Constitutions. This is true, too, of the scheme of the act with respect to the examiner's findings of fact incorporated in his final report.

"(2) The act is violative of the guaranty of the state Constitution that 'the right of trial by jury * * * shall remain inviolate.' Article 6, § 18, par. 1; Civil Code of 1910, § 6545.

"(3) The act is unconstitutional, because it confers upon the judge of the superior court the right to render judgment without the verdict of a jury in a civil case other than one founded on an unconditional contract in writing where no issuable defense is filed under oath. Article 6, § 4, par. 7; Civil Code of 1910, § 5660.

"(4) The act is unconstitutional, because it refers to more than one subject-matter, and because it contains matter different from what is expressed in its title." Article 3, § 7, par. 8; Civil Code, § 6437.

[1] The act of the General Assembly approved August 21, 1917 (Acts 1917, p. 108), known as the land registration act, is an adaption of the Torrens system to the Constitution and laws of this state. It follows closely, though differing in some particulars, the registration acts of a number of other states, among them Illinois (Laws 1897, pp. 141-165; Laws 1903, pp. 121-123); California (Statutes 1897, c. 110, pp. 138-167; General Laws 1899, pp. 1219, 1257; Statutes 1915, pp. 1932-1951); Massachusetts (Acts 1898, pp. 682-722; Revised Laws 1902, c. 128); Minnesota (General Laws 1901, pp. 348-378);

Oregon (General Laws 1901, pp. 438-467); Colorado (Laws 1903, pp. 311-352; Rev. Stat. 1908, pp. 334-355); Washington (Session Laws 1907, pp. 693-738); New York (Laws 1908, pp. 1247-1283; Consolidated Laws 1909 [Highway Law], pp. 3459-3494; Laws 1910, c. 627); North Carolina (Pub. Acts 1913, pp. 147-159); Mississippi (Laws 1913, pp. 158-175); Ohio (Laws 1913, pp. 914-960); Nebraska (Laws 1915, pp. 494-526); Virginia (Acts 1916, c. 62, p. 70); South Carolina (Acts 1916, p. 942). The Illinois act of 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 107), perhaps the earliest registration act in the United States, was declared unconstitutional upon the ground that there was a delegation of judicial powers in violation of the Constitution of that state. People v. Chase, 165 Ill. 527, 46 N. E. 454, 36 L. R. A. 105. The Ohio act of 1896 (92 Ohio Laws, p. 220) was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of that state, upon substantially the same ground, and upon the ground that the act violated the due course of law guaranteed by the Ohio Bill of Rights, in that it provided for inadequate service, especially upon known adverse claimants residing in the state, and upon the further ground that it attempted to authorize the taking of private property for uses not public, without compensation. See State v. Guilbert, 56 Ohio St. 575, 47 N. E. 551, 38 L. R. A. 519, 60 Am. St. Rep. 756. In 1897, as noted above, the Legislature of Illinois passed a similar law designed to meet the constitutional tests fixed by the Supreme Court in the Chase case; and the court sustained the latter act, in People v. Simon, 176 Ill. 165, 52 N. E. 910, 44 L. R. A. 801, 68 Am. St. Rep. 175. In 1913, after an amendment to the Constitution of Ohio, a registration act was passed which was held not to be objectionable. With the exceptions noted, the validity of land registration acts have been uniformly upheld. See Tyler v. Judges, 175 Mass. 71, 55 N. E. 812, 51 L. R. A. 433; Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 40, 90 Pac. 129, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 12 Ann. Cas. 829; State v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 89 N. W. 175, 57 L. R. A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571; Peters v. Duluth, 119 Minn. 96, 137 N. W. 390, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1044; People v. Crissman, 41 Colo. 450, 92 Pac. 949. The subject is fully annotated in L. R. A. 1916D, 14. The Supreme Court of the United States, in American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 31 Sup. Ct. 200, 55 L. Ed. 82, upheld an act resting upon the same constitutional basis as the land registration acts.

[5] The object of the land registration acts will be further noticed in a subsequent division of this opinion; but it will be helpful to call attention at this point to some of the essentials of title to land nowhere to be discovered of record under the system of evidencing title heretofore existing in this state. Among these were: The genuineness of signatures of grantors and of attesting witnesses in recorded deeds; jurisdiction and authority of official witnesses; status and identity of persons professing to be heirs at law; full age of grantors and donees; sanity; the fact and validity of marriage and of divorce; prescription; adverse possession; the power and authority of corporate officers; the validity of tax deeds (depending upon whether the levy was excessive, etc.). Other illustrations might be given. The land registration act is therefore a remedial statute, and should be liberally construed "according to its intent, 'so as to advance the remedy and repress the evil,'" as said by the Supreme Court of North Carolina in Cape Lookout Co. v. Gold, 187 N. C. 63, 83 S. E. 3. It is unnecessary to set out at length the act under consideration. We will notice only the provisions of the act necessary to a determination of the precise questions made in the present case.

A suit for registration of title is commenced by petition by the applicant "against the world" as well as against the land in rem. "All persons who by the petition are disclosed to have any lien, interest, equity or claims, adverse to the petitioner or otherwise, vested or contingent, upon said land or any interest therein," and all other persons "whom it may concern," are defendants in the proceeding. All known defendants resident in the state must be served as in ordinary actions. Service by publication is provided on adverse nonresident and unknown claimants. Jurisdiction in rem is obtained by the sheriff going on the land and posting a notice thereon, and by service of notice upon every occupant of the land above the age of 14 years. Powell on Land Registration, § 15. Section 16 of the act provides:

"Upon the filing of a petition, as provided in this act, the clerk shall at once notify the judge, who shall refer the cause to one of the general examiners or to a special examiner. It shall thereupon become the duty of such examiner to make up a preliminary report containing an abstract of the title to the land from public records and all other evidences of a trustworthy nature than can reasonably be obtained by him, which said abstract shall contain full enough extracts from the records, and other matters referred to therein, to enable the court to decide the questions involved; also a statement of the facts relating to the possession of the lands; also containing the names and addresses, so far as he is able to ascertain, of all persons interested in the land, as well as all adjoining owners, showing their several apparent or possible interests, and indicating upon whom and in what manner process should be served or notices given, in accordance with the provisions of this act. The preliminary report of the examiner shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court, on or before the return day of the court, as stated in the process, unless the time for filing the same shall be extended by the court; and the said report shall be prima facie evidence of the contents thereof."

If the preliminary report of the examiner discloses that other persons than those who shall have been notified are entitled to notice, provision is made in the seventeenth section of the act for service of a copy of the petition upon such persons. By the eighteenth section of the act any person, whether notified or not, may become a party to the proceeding, may file objections to the granting of the relief prayed, or any part thereof, by answer asserting some interest in the premises and the grounds of his objection, or he may file a cross-action, praying that the title to the land or some interest therein be decreed to be in him and registered accordingly. The nineteenth section requires the examiner to hear evidence and make his final report to the court, after notice of the time and place of hearing as therein provided. The twentieth section of the act is as follows:

"At the time and place set for the hearing the examiner shall, in like manner as other auditors or masters in chancery, proceed with similar powers, as to the compelling of the attendance of witnesses, the production of books and papers, and of adjournment and recessing to hear all lawful evidences submitted. In addition thereto he is empowered to make such independent examination of the title as he may deem necessary. Upon his request the clerk shall issue commission for the taking of testimony of such witnesses as, under the provisions of law on that subject, may have their testimony taken by interrogatories in ordinary actions. He shall also have the powers of a commissioner appointed by the superior court under sections 5910 to 5917, inclusive, of the Civil Code of 1910. Within fifteen days after such hearing shall have been concluded the examiner, unless for good cause the time shall be extended by the judge, shall file with the clerk a report of his conclusions of law and of fact, setting forth the state of the title, any liens or incumbrances thereon, by whom held, the amounts due thereon, together with the abstract of title to said land, and any other information affecting its validity, and a brief or a stenographic report of the evidence taken by him. He shall mail to each of the parties who have appeared in the cause notice of the filing of his report. Any of the parties to the proceeding may, within twenty days after such report is filed, file exceptions to the conclusions of law or of fact or to the general findings of the examiner. The clerk shall thereupon notify the judge that the record is ready for his determination. If the petitioner, or any contestant of petitioner's right, shall demand a trial by jury upon any issue of fact arising upon exceptions to the examiner's report, the court shall cause the same to be referred to a jury, either at the term of court which may then be in session or at the next term of the court, or at any succeeding term of the court, to which the case may be continued for good and lawful reasons; but it shall be the duty of the judge to expedite the hearing of the case, and not to continue it unless for good cause shown, or upon the consent of all parties at interest. The issue or issues of fact shall be tried before the jury, in the event jury trial is requested, upon the evidence reported by the examiner, except in cases where, under the provisions of law in this state, evidence other than that reported by the auditor may be submitted to the jury on exceptions to an auditor's report; and except, further, that in the case the examiner has reported to the court findings of fact based on his personal examination, either party may introduce additional testimony as to such facts, provided that he will make it appear, under oath, that he has not been fully heard and given full opportunity to present testimony on the same matter before the examiner. The verdict of the jury upon the questions of fact shall operate to the same extent as it would in the case of exceptions to an auditor's report in an ordinary case in equity. In all matters not otherwise provided for, the procedure upon the examiner's report and the exceptions thereto shall be in accordance with procedure prevailing in this state as to auditor's reports in equity and exceptions thereto. The right to grant a new trial upon any issue submitted to a jury, and right of exception to the Supreme Court, are prescribed. The judge may refer or recommit the record to the examiner in like manner as auditor's reports may be recommitted in any equity cause; or he may, on his own motion, recommit it to the same or any other examiner for further information and report."

The preliminary report of the examiner is to be made upon information gathered by the examiner from his own investigations of the public records, and from all other evidence of a trustworthy nature that can be reasonably obtained by him, without notice and an opportunity to the parties to be heard, and the preliminary report is made "prima facie evidence of the contents thereof." Section 20 of the act contemplates that the independent findings of the examiner may be incorporated in his final report, and the independent findings of the examiner as reported by him are to be taken as prima facie true. This is said to offend the due process of law clauses of both the state and federal Constitutions. It is said that this is against the law of the land. Returns, reports, and certificates of sworn public officers have in many instances been declared to be prima facie evidence of the facts to which such returns, reports, and certificates relate. One example will suffice; Under Civil Code 1910, § 5170, the burden of proof in a claim case is "upon the plaintiff in execution in all cases where the property levied on is, at the time of such levy, not in possession of the defendant in execution." Where the entry of levy made by the officer recites that the defendant in execution was in possession of the property at the time of the levy, the recital is prima facie true, and determines the burden of proof. Burt v. Rubley, 113 Ga. 1144, 39 S. E. 409. Though possession of and title to land are involved, the rule of evidence is undoubtedly within the power of the Legislature. See Vance v. State, 128 Ga. 661, 57 S. E. 889. The provisions of section 16 of the act are considered by Judge Powell in his work on "Land Registration" in sections 80-87, inclusive. The purpose of the preliminary report, and how far it is prima facie evidence of the "contents thereof," are pointed out. The provisions of section 20 of the act relating to the functions and duties of the examiner on the hearing, and to the special powers of the examiner, are considered by the author in sections 89-95, inclusive. As said above, it is within the power of the Legislature to make the report of a sworn public officer prima facie evidence of the facts to which the report relates so far as it relates to facts within the scope of the officer's duties. Considering the further provision of the act contained in section 21, that "no judgment or decree shall be rendered by default so as to authorize any decree to be rendered without the necessary facts being shown," sections 16 and 20 of the act, providing for and making the independent findings of the examiner prima facie evidence of the truth of the facts therein asserted, are not violative of the due process of law clause of the state or federal Constitution. The special duties and powers of the examiner in this respect must be regarded as affording not only due process of law, but ample process. The application to register title under the act must proceed upon inquiry; the findings of the examiner are not conclusive; and final judgment can be rendered only after trial. See People v. Crissman, 41 Colo. 450, 92 Pac. 949.

[2, 6] This brings us to a consideration of the second ground of attack on the act. Article 6, § 18, par. 1, of the constitution of this state (Civil Code 1910, § 6545) declares that—

This provision is uniformly construed as not conferring a right to trial by jury in all classes of cases, but merely as guaranteeing the continuance of the right unchanged as it existed either at common law or by statute in the particular state at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. 24 Cyc. 101. Prior to the Constitution certain classes of cases were triable without a jury. All cases triable without a jury prior to the adoption of the Constitution may still be so tried. It will be conceded that it is competent for the Legislature to provide for a trial without a jury in cases similar to those in which such a trial was in use prior to the adoption of the Constitution. Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 20 Am. Rep. 194; Tift v. Griffin, 5 Ga. 185. The constitutional guaranty of jury trial does not apply to cases in equity. Mahan v. Cavender, 77 Ga. 118; Poullain v.

Brown, 80 Ga. 27, 5 S. E. 107; Mackenzie v. Flannery, 90 Ga. 590, 16 S. E. 710; Bemis v. Armour Packing Co., 105 Ga. 293, 31 S. E. 173. In a number of cases in this state it has been held that in civil actions the right of jury trial exists only in those cases where the right existed prior to the first Constitution, and that the guaranty does not apply to special proceedings not then known or subsequently created or provided by statute; for examples: Proceedings in the court of ordinary, Davis v. Harper, 54 Ga. 180; contested election cases, Freeman v. State, 72 Ga. 812; proceedings against road defaulters, Haney v. Commissioners, 91 Ga. 773, 18 S. E. 28; Blankenship v. State, 40 Ga. 680; partition proceedings, Rodgers v. Price, 105 Ga. 67, 31 S. E. 126; condemnation proceedings, Savannah, etc., Ry. Co. v. Postal Telegraph Co., 112 Ga. 941, 38 S. E. 353; proceedings to validate bonds, Lippitt v. Albany, 131 Ga. 629, 63 S. E. 33. See De Lamar v. Dollar, 128 Ga. 57, 57 S. E. 85; Pearson v. Wimbish, 124 Ga. 701, 52 S. E. 751, 4 Ann. Cas. 501; Flint River Steamboat Co. v. Foster, 5 Ga. 194, 207, 48 Am. Dec. 248. In Peters v. Duluth, 119 Minn. 96, 137 N. W. 390, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1044, it was held that Torrens laws have the general purpose to clear up and settle land titles, and are nothing more or else than an enlargement of the remedy to quiet title. Hence here is no constitutional right to a jury trial in Minnesota, under article 1, section 4, of the Constitution of that state, which declares that—

"The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, and shall extend to all cases of law without regard to the amount in controversy."

In the opinion it was said that—"There was no such right [to trial by jury] upon the ancient bill to remove cloud and quiet title; and it has been held in this state that the constitutional guaranty does not apply thereto" (citing Yanish v. Pioneer Fuel Co., 64 Minn. 175, 66 N. W. 198).

No provision is made for a jury trial in the acts of California, Colorado, Minnesota, Ohio, Oregon, and Washington. A jury trial is expressly provided for by the acts of Massachusetts, Mississippi, North Carolina, New York, and Georgia. In Weeks v. Brooks, 205 Mass. 458, 92 N. E. 45, it was held that a jury trial, where the title to real property is put in issue is a matter of right, and is not a privilege to be granted in the sound discretion of the court, in view of the constitutional provision that there shall be a right to a trial by jury "in all controversies concerning property." But the same court, in Mead v. Cutler, 194 Mass. 277, 80 N. E. 496, held that the provision of the Land Registration Act of 1904 (St. 1904, c. 488), relating to appeals from the land court, that "no matters shall be tried in the superior court except those specified in the appeal," is a reasonable regulation of the way in which the right to such appeals may be exercised, and is not an unconstitutional limitation of the right to trial by jury. In the opinion, by Morton, J., it is said that the natural effect of the provision "will or may be to eliminate immaterial matters, and thus to facilitate instead of impede the exercise of the right of trial by jury." By reference to the twentieth section, set out at length in the preceding division of this opinion, it will be seen that as soon as the examiner's report is filed it becomes a public record and open to the inspection of any interested person.

"Any of the parties to the proceeding may, within twenty days after such report is filed, file exceptions to the conclusions of law or of fact or to the general findings of the examiner."

Within the same time any party at interest may move to recommit the report for indefiniteness, lack of fullness, failure to separate and classify the findings of law and fact, or other like cause. The right of filing exceptions or of moving to recommit is not confined to those who have appeared before the examiner, but any party to the cause has the right.

"The right to jury trial on exceptions of fact is broader under the act than it is in the general equity practice in this state." Powell's Land Registration, § —.

To quote again from section 20:

"If the petitioner, or any contestant of petitioner's right, shall demand a trial by jury upon any issue of fact arising upon exceptions to the examiner's report, the court shall cause the same to be referred to a jury."

Under the Georgia Act, the right of trial by jury exists as a matter of right and not as a matter of discretion, and the question is whether the trial by jury provided by the act is a constitutional jury trial. It is true that the act provides that the issue or issues of fact shall be tried before the jury, in the event the jury trial is requested, upon the evidence reported by the examiner. But exceptions are made; and under the provisions of the act evidence other than that reported by the auditor may be submitted to the jury, in accordance with proceedings prevailing in this state as to auditor's reports in equity and exceptions thereto. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5144, 5145. Moreover, if the examiner has reported to the court findings of fact based on his personal examination, either party may introduce additional testimony as to the facts, provided that he shall make it appear under oath that he has not been fully heard and given full opportunity to present testimony on the same matter before the examiner. As pointed out in Peters v. Duluth, supra, the relief in ejectment is not coextensive with that which may be had under the land registration act of this state. In ejectment title can never be settled as against the world. Conversely, relief may be had in ejectment which cannot be had under the act, namely, possession of the premises and judgment for mesne profits, etc. The act is not a substitute for ejectment or for the statutory action for land. It is not an equitable action, but is a statutory proceeding, as held by this court in Bird v. South Georgia Industrial Co., 150 Ga. 420, 104 S. E. 232. A proceeding to register the title may be brought by a person in possession against others not in possession, contrary to the rule in ejectment. As said by Mr. Justice Atkinson in Lippitt v. Albany, 131 Ga. 629, 682, 68 S. E. 33, 34 (referring to the statutory proceeding to validate bonds), "if it be sought to analogize such a proceeding to a common-law suit or to an equitable action, it would more nearly approximate the latter." It is, as the act itself declares, an action in rem, but the relief afforded is closely analogous to the equitable relief in an action to remove cloud and quiet title. The Legislature may make a demand for a jury a condition to the enjoyment of the right. It may place restrictions upon the time and manner in which the demand may be made. Sutton v. Gunn, 88 Ga. 652, 12 S. E. 979; Southern Ry. Co. v. Beach, 117 Ga. 81, 43 S. E. 413. In Flint River Steamboat Co. v. Foster, 5 Ga. 194, 195 (7-10) 48 Am. Dec. 248, it was held:

"The provision in the Constitution of Georgia that 'trial by jury, as heretofore used, shall remain inviolate,' means, that it shall not be taken away, in cases where it existed when that instrument was adopted in 1798; and not that there must be a jury in all cases. Trial by jury is a privilege which may be waived. And when the defendant has an opportunity to demand it, and omits to do so, he cannot complain that it is denied. An act of the Legislature, authorizing a judgment to be rendered without the intervention of a jury, is not, on that account, unconstitutional. Trial by jury may be clogged with onerous conditions, yet the act prescribing such terms will not be pronounced unconstitutional, unless it totally deprives the right, or renders it wholly unavailing to the defendant, for his protection."

The constitutional guaranty of jury trial does not limit the power of the Legislature to prescribe rules of evidence or of procedure. The power of the court to appoint an auditor in a case at law not involving an accounting, and to restrict the hearing to the evidence taken before the auditor, is upheld in Poulain v. Brown, 80 Ga. 27, 5 S. E. 107. It is true that in a law case exceptions to the auditor's report must be submitted to a jury, but the power of the court to refer the case to an auditor and to restrict the hearing to the evidence taken before the auditor, even in a case at law, cannot be seriously questioned, in view of the decision above cited. See, also, Central Trust Co. v. Thurman, 94 Ga. 735, 786, 20 S. E. 141. In view of our statutes providing for the taking of interrogatories and of depositions, it can hardly be contended that the examination of the witnesses in the presence of the jury is a substantial and indispensable incident of trial by jury, within the constitutional guaranty. In view of the foregoing, we are of the opinion that the land registration act of this state affords a constitutional jury trial.

[3] 8. Section 28 of the act provides as follows:

"After the record shall have been perfected and settled, the judge of the superior court shall thereupon proceed to decide the cause; and if, upon consideration of such record, the title be found in the petitioner, the judge shall enter a decree to that effect, ascertaining all limitations, liens, incumbrances, etc., and declaring the land entitled to registration."

If the judge finds that the petitioner is not entitled to the decree declaring the land entitled to registration, he shall enter judgment accordingly. If title be found to be in any person who has filed a cross-action praying for the registration of the title, the judge shall enter a decree declaring the land entitled to registration accordingly. If separate parties are involved, separate decrees as to each parcel shall be rendered, etc. Section 27 of the act provides that—

"Every decree rendered as herein provided, shall bind the land and bar all persons claiming title thereto or interest therein, quiet the title thereto, and shall be forever binding and conclusive upon and against all persons," including the state.

In the proceeding to register the title, as already indicated, no judgment for money or land is entered against any party; no direct judgment for immediate recovery of the land is entered against any one. In view of what we have said in the next preceding division of the opinion, and of the nature of the decree authorized by the registration act, the act is not violative of the restriction contained in article 6, section 4, paragraph 7, of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code 1910, § 6516), which declares that—

"The court shall render judgment without the verdict of a jury, in all civil cases founded on unconditional contracts in writing, where an issuable defense is not filed under oath or affirmation."

In this connection see Isaacs v. Tinley, 53 Ga. 457(2); Palmer v. Simpson, 69 Ga. 792(3).

[4] 4. It is finally insisted that the act is violative of article 3, section 7, paragraph 8, of the Constitution (Civil Code 1910, § 6437) because it refers to more than one subject-matter, and because it contains matter different from what is expressed in its title. The caption of the act is:

"An act to provide for the assurance, registration, and transfer of land titles and interests therein, and for other purposes."

It is alleged in the petition for injunction that section 2 of the act in effect creates a new court by designating the superior court of each of the counties of the state as a land registration court; that section 5 of the act creates a new and distinct action for the trial of cases respecting title to land, since it authorizes registration proceedings by one out of possession against an adverse claimant in possession; and section 85 of the act creates and defines a number of crimes, and prescribes the punishment therefor. In elaboration of the contention that the act contains matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof, it is alleged in the petition for injunction that the entire act deals with a subject-matter of which no notice or intimation is given in the title; that section 5 thereof permits one claiming title to land and not in possession thereof to file a proceeding seeking the registration of such land, and thereby make such proceeding a substitute for the common-law action of ejectment or the statutory action of complaint for land; that section 40 of the act amends and in effect repeals the existing laws of the state with reference to the recordation of deeds, mortgages, and other writings relating to land; that sections 42 to 47, inclusive, amend and in effect repeal the existing laws of the state with reference to the title of the personal representative of a deceased person to the land of such deceased and the method by which title is transmitted upon the death of a person testate or intestate, in so far as lands registered under the terms of the act are concerned; that section 66 thereof amends and in effect repeals existing laws of the state with reference to title by prescription and adverse possession; that section 2 creates a land registration court; that section 85 creates and defines a number of felonies, and prescribes the punishment therefor, and that, in short, the effect of the act as a whole is to create two systems of land tenure in Georgia, one governed by the laws of the state existing prior to the adoption of the act and one by the act. There is no elaboration of the point in the brief of counsel for defendants in error, but we do not understand that the point is abandoned. It follows from what we have already said that many, if not all, the contentions stated are untenable; and we are of the opinion that the act does not refer to more than one subject-matter, and that it does not contain matter different from what is expressed in its title, in any of the particulars pointed out. In the brief of counsel for the defendant in error the case of Morris v. State, 117 Ga. 1, 43 S. E. 868, where it was held that the title of an act "to regulate dentistry and the practice thereof, * * * and for other purposes," was sufficient to authorize the Legislature to prescribe penalties for violations of its provisions, is referred to and discussed. It is said that this ruling was made with reference to a police regulation. As we think, the title of the act here involved, viz., "An act to provide for the assurance, registration, and transfer of land titles and interests therein and for other purposes," is broad enough to authorize the Legislature to declare acts in violation of its provisions criminal and to prescribe penalties for violations of its provisions. But whether or not section 85 of the act (providing penalties for the violations of the provisions of the act) contains different subject-matter from that included in the general body of the act and beyond the purview of the caption, the act as a whole is not unconstitutional on that ground, because that section is not so essential a part of the general purpose of the act that its elimination would destroy the legislative scheme and invalidate the act in its entirety.

Having held the land registration act valid as against the objections raised in this case, it follows, in view of the stipulations of counsel and the recitals in the bill of exceptions, that the court erred in granting the injunction.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., disqualified.

SAUNDERS v. STATEN et al. (two cases)
(Nos. 2297, 2298.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Constitutional law §306—Records §2—Land registration act not void.

The contention that the land registration act (Acts 1917, p. 108) is void because the sixteenth and twentieth sections of said act violate the due process clause of the Constitutions of Georgia (Civ. Code 1910, § 6359) and of the United States (Civ. Code 1910, § 8700), is controlled adversely to the plaintiffs in error by the decision in Crowell v. Akin, 108 S. E. 791.

2. Jury §19(1)—Land registration act does not violate constitutional provision as to right of trial by jury.

The contention that section 20 of said act (Laws 1917, p. 116) is void because it violates the provisions of the state Constitution (Civ. Code 1910, § 6545), which declares that "the right of trial by jury, except where it is otherwise provided in this Constitution shall remain inviolate," is also controlled adversely to the plaintiffs in error by the decision just cited.

3. Adverse possession §45—Filing of equitable petition and granting of injunction held not to interrupt adverse possession of lessor.

The filing of an equitable petition against the lessees of one in possession of land, and the grant, by consent, of an interlocutory injunction as prayed, restraining the defendants from further working timber on said land for turpentine, and also providing that the defendants, upon giving bond in a stated sum, might continue working the timber for turpentine purposes until the trial of the case, but not to cut any new boxes, or, if defendants preferred, upon depositing the net proceeds of the sales of the turpentine products in a stated bank to await the final disposition of the case, said lessees having given the bond and continued to work the timber, and it appearing that said suit has never proceeded to final trial or any other disposition, but remains open on the docket, and the lessors of the defendants in possession of the land at the time of the filing of the suit having continued to occupy the land by their agents and tenants who resided thereon and cultivated a portion of the land, will not be sufficient to interrupt the adverse possession of the lessor who seeks to establish title by prescription under color.

4. Records  $\S$ 9(10, 12)—Duty to submit issues of fact to jury mandatory; failure to submit not prejudicial.

"If the petitioner, or any contestant of petitioner's right, shall demand a trial by jury upon any issue of fact arising upon exceptions to the examiner's report, the court shall cause the same to be referred to a jury." Acts 1917, p. 117 (the land registration act). It has been held that this duty of the court is mandatory. Crowell v. Akin, supra. Nevertheless, where on the report of the examiner no issue of fact arises, and where there is no conflict in the evidence, and the court renders a judgment in accord with the evidence, instead of impaneling a jury and directing a verdict, the failure to submit such undisputed facts to a jury is not injurious to the losing party, and therefore not cause for a reversal.

5. Prescription—Evidence sufficient.

In these cases the evidence showed, without conflict, that the applicants and those under whom they claimed had, prior to the filing of the petitions for registration, been in public, continuous, exclusive, uninterrupted, and peaceable possession of the land for the time required by statute to perfect a good title by prescription under color; and there was no evidence that such possession was not in good faith, or that it originated in fraud. None of the assignments of error show cause for a reversal of the judgment.

Atkinson, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Echols County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Two actions by Eula Staten, executrix, and others against J. G. Saunders. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. L. Sweat and Wilson & Bennett, all of Waycross, for plaintiff in error.

J. B. Hicks, of Statenville, and Dan R. Bruce, of Valdosta, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgments affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., absent, and ATKINSON, J., dissenting as to the ruling in the first and second headnote.

FAUCETT v. ROGERS (No. 2353.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Reference  $\S$ 105—Court not required to submit exception of fact to jury.

Presiding judge is not compelled as a matter of course in an equitable proceeding to submit a finding of fact by an auditor to the jury. under Civ. Code 1910, § 5142.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$ 107(1)—Whether auditor had authority to apportion costs held immaterial.

Whether an auditor had authority to make a finding as to costs and a division thereof in a boundary dispute was immaterial, where the court in rendering decree adjudged, as it was authorized to do, that each of parties should pay one-half of all costs in the case.

3. Reference  $\S$ 100(4)—Court not required to examine entire evidence under exception.

An exception of law that auditor in boundary dispute improperly admitted a certain instrument as an ancient document was incomplete, where it referred the court to "entire evidence bearing on the location of the line or referring to this plat"; matter attached thereto being composed of 175 pages of what purported to be evidence reported by the auditor, which burden the court was not required to undertake.

4. Evidence  $\S$ 258(1)—Admissions of agent held inadmissible.

In a boundary dispute auditor did not err in excluding alleged admission of a third person not interested in the case, although he was brother of plaintiff, and had been looking after the property for her, and represented her when surveys were made; nothing appearing to show that he had authority to make any admissions that would be binding on her.

5. Evidence  $\S$ 317(18)—Declarations of decedent held properly excluded as hearsay.

In a boundary dispute, testimony as to sayings of a deceased justice of the peace and notary public, who lived about a mile from the land, and owned land in the neighborhood, and who was about 70 when the statements were made, was properly excluded as hearsay.

6. Reference  $\S$ 100(4)—Exception should set forth evidence necessary to be considered in passing thereon.

The neglect of a party excepting to an auditor's report on matters of fact, or matters of law dependant for their decision upon the evidence, to set forth, in connection with each exception of law or of fact, the evidence necessary to be considered in passing thereon, or to point out the same by appropriate reference, or to attach as exhibits to his exceptions those portions of evidence relied on to support the exceptions, is a sufficient reason, in an equity case, for refusing to approve the exceptions of fact, and for overruling the exceptions of law.

7. Reference to 100(3)—Exceptions to auditor's report must be filed within 20 days.

Exceptions to an auditor's report must be filed within 20 days after the filing of the report, Civ. Code 1910, § 5135, being mandatory, and if an amendment can be allowed at all after the 20 days, so as to add a new and distinct exception, it must at least be necessary to show good reason why the exception was not filed with others in due time.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Suit by Lou Rogers against William Faucett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. H. Perry, of Gainesville, for plaintiff in error.

Ed Quillian and W. A. Charters, both of Gainesville, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. This is a suit brought by Mrs. Lou Rogers against William Faucett, to enjoin the defendant from trespassing upon certain land to which the plaintiff claims title. The issue is dependent upon the location of the true dividing line between adjacent lands of the parties. The court appointed a surveyor selected by the parties, who by a survey located the line where the plaintiff claims it to be, and made a report of his survey, accompanied by a plat. An auditor was appointed to hear the evidence and to make findings of fact and law in the case. After hearing, the auditor made his report of his findings of fact and of law, which were favorable to the plaintiff, with the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to a perpetual injunction as prayed for against the defendant.

[1] 1. The defendant filed an exception of fact to the finding of fact by the auditor that the true line between the adjacent lands of the parties is located where the plaintiff claims it to be, and as particularly described in the report, survey, and plat of the surveyor. The ground of exception is that such finding of the auditor is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it. The court refused to approve this exception and to submit the issue sought to be raised thereby to a jury. As the case is an equitable proceeding, the presiding judge was not compelled, as a matter of course, to submit such exception of fact to the jury. Civil Code 1910, § 5142. Though the evidence is conflicting, it is amply sufficient to sustain the finding of fact by the auditor, and there was no abuse of discretion by the court in refusing to approve the exception.

[2] 2. The defendant filed several exceptions of law to the findings of law made by the auditor. The first is really based upon the finding of fact by the auditor to which the defendant excepted, and our ruling as to that exception of fact is controlling as to this exception of law. The second is to the finding of the auditor that the costs in the case, including the court costs, stenographer's fee, the cost of making the survey ordered by the court, and the auditor's fee "be equally divided between the parties to the case, each to pay half of the same." Whether the auditor did or did not have authority to make a finding as to the costs in the case is immaterial, as the court, in rendering the decree, adjudged, as it was authorized to do, that each of the parties should pay half of all costs in the case.

[3] 3. The third exception of law is that the auditor admitted in evidence as an ancient document a surveyor's plat, made in 1853, of certain land of which one McDaniel then claimed to be the owner; one of the lots in the survey being that to which the plaintiff now claims title. The defendant excepted to this ruling of the auditor, on the grounds that the plat was irrelevant, not shown to be correct, that it does not show that the lots platted are in the county of Hall, and because it does not show the location of the line now in controversy. The following is stated in this exception:

"Turner Quillian did testify that he had known this plat 35 or 40 years, and saw it among his father's papers, which his father got from Samuel Chambers to lot 7 in the twelfth district [the lot now claimed by plaintiff] and 6 in the eleventh district, which his father bought from said Chambers. There was no evidence from any witness as to the correctness of the plat. A copy of said plat is hereto attached, and the entire evidence bearing on the location of the line or referring to the plat is attached to these exceptions, and is here referred to in connection with these exceptions of law, though no witness testified to correctness of this plat."

This exception is not complete in itself. It refers the court to "the entire evidence bearing on the location of the line or referring to this plat." In order to ascertain what portions of the evidence bear on this question, the court would have to examine some 175 pages of what purports to be the evidence reported by the auditor. The court is not required to undertake this burden.

[4] 4. The fourth exception of law is that the auditor erred in excluding certain alleged admissions of Turner Quillian, a third person not interested in the case, as to the land line in question. It appears that he is the brother of the plaintiff, that he had been looking after the property for her, and that "in all these surveys, when he was present, he represented Mrs. Rogers." Nothing appears showing that he had authority as the agent of the plaintiff to make any admissions in respect of the land line that would be binding on her.

[5] 5. The rulings made by the auditor in excluding as hearsay certain sayings of Squire O'Kelley in reference to the land line in question, and excepted to by the defendant in exceptions 5, 6, 7, and 8, were correct. It is stated in the exception that—

"The following evidence in the record shows that the evidence was admissible under the rules of law; that Squire O'Kelley was dead, that he was a justice of the peace and N. P., and had been 20 or 30 years; that he lived about a mile from the land; that he was an old man, a veteran of the Civil War; that he was in possession of land and owned land in the neighborhood (pages 18 and 19 of the evidence); that it was his custom to write deeds; that he was about 70 when the statements were made; that he always lived in that neighborhood (page 44 of the evidence), all of which was in evidence when this testimony was offered. It also appeared, at the time the evidence was offered, that Squire O'Kelley was in possession of the west half of lot No. 6 in the eleventh district (page 49 of the evidence)."

The west half of lot No. 6 in the eleventh district is not adjacent to either the land of the plaintiff or that of the defendant. That the ruling was proper, see Aultman v. Hodge, 150 Ga. 370, 399, 104 S. E. 1; McAfee v. Newberry, 144 Ga. 473, 87 S. E. 392.

[6] 6. "The neglect of a party excepting to an auditor's report on matters of fact, or on matters of law dependent for their decision upon the evidence, to set forth, in connection with each exception of law or of fact, the evidence necessary to be considered in passing thereon, or to point out the same by appropriate reference, or to attach as exhibits to his exceptions those portions of the evidence relied on to support the exceptions, is a sufficient reason, in an equity case, for refusing to approve the exceptions of fact and for overruling the exceptions of law. Orr v. Cooledge, 125 Ga. 496, 54 S. E. 618; Winkles v. Simpson Grocery Co., 132 Ga. 32, 63 S. E. 627; McCord v. City of Jackson, 135 Ga. 176 (4), 177, 69 S. E. 23." Smith v. Wilkinson, 143 Ga. 741, 85 S. E. 875. Applying the rulings above stated to exceptions of law Nos. 9, 10, and 11, the court did not err in overruling such exceptions.

[7] 7. Exceptions to an auditor's report must be filed within 20 days after the filing of the report. Civil Code 1910, § 5135. The law as to this is mandatory. Littleton v. Patton, 112 Ga. 438 (4), 37 S. E. 755. If an amendment can be allowed at all after the 20 days, so as to add new and distinct exceptions, it must at least be necessary to show good reason why the exception was not filed with others in due time. Sizer v. Melton, 129 Ga. 143 (1) 58 S. E. 1055; Mohr-Weil Lumber Co. v. Russell, 109 Ga. 579, 34 S. E. 1005.

8. In view of the rulings above announced, the court did not err in approving the auditor's report, and in decreeing that the defendant below be perpetually enjoined as prayed for in the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

RICHARDS v. STATE. (No. 2663.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 15, 1921.)

1. Homicide — 157(4) — Alterations taking place in remote past immaterial.

Upon the trial of one charged with the offense of murder, evidence that there had been alterations between the accused and the deceased was not of sufficient materiality to make the rejection of the evidence ground for the grant of a new trial, where the times at which such alterations took place were not indicated. If such alterations were in the remote past, the evidence was immaterial; and the ground of the motion complaining of the rejection of this evidence does not indicate in any way the times of the occurrences referred to.

(a) The same ruling applies to the evidence offered as to the display a "violent temper" on the part of the decedent against the accused.

2. Homicide — 163(2) — Evidence as to securing of services of party to watch people in town inadmissible to illustrate temperament of deceased.

Evidence that the deceased at some indefinite time in the past had sought to engage the services of a named party to "watch certain people in this town," it not appearing that the people referred to were in any way connected with the commission of the crime, was immaterial; nor was it admissible for the restricted purpose of "illustrating the mental condition and temperament" of the deceased.

3. Criminal law — 448(11) — Witness could testify that accused looked mad.

Testimony of a witness, who saw the accused immediately after he had shot the deceased, that the accused "looked mad," is not objectionable on the ground that it was a conclusion of the witness. See 5 Enc. Ev. 674 et seq., and cases there cited.

4. Witnesses — 268(3) — Accused entitled on cross-examination to entire conversation, wherein he admitted he fired shot resulting in death of deceased.

Where a witness for the state testified that the accused had admitted that he fired the shot which resulted in the killing of the deceased, counsel for the plaintiff in error should have been permitted upon cross-examination to elicit from the witness all of the statements made by the accused in connection with that admission, and the refusal of the privilege of a full and complete cross-examination upon this point was error.

Error from Superior Court, Tallahassee County; E. T. Shurley, Judge.

Garnett Richards was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

J. A. Beazley and Alvin G. Golucke, both of Crawfordville, for plaintiff in error.

M. L. Felts, Sol. Gen., of Warrenton, Geo. M. Napier, Atty. Gen., and Seward M. Smith, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Garnett Richards was tried under an indictment charging him with the offense of murder; it being charged that he did kill and murder one Julian Richards, the brother of the accused. The jury trying the case returned a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy. Whereupon the defendant made a motion for new trial, which being overruled, he excepted.

[1-3] 1-3. It would not be profitable to discuss or elaborate the rulings made in headnotes 1, 2, and 3.

[4] 4. In another ground of the motion for new trial error is assigned upon a ruling of the court which amounted, the movant contends, to a denial of the privilege of cross-examining a witness for the state in regard to a material issue as to which that witness had given testimony. The witness on direct examination testified that the defendant had admitted to him that he shot Julian Richards, the decedent; and counsel for the plaintiff in error propounded questions by which they sought to elicit from the witness all that the defendant said in connection with his admission that he shot the deceased. This colloquy took place:

Mr. Beazley (Counsel for the Accused): "You stated awhile ago that Garnett admitted shooting Julian. What did he say when he admitted it?"

Mr. Felts (Counsel for the State): "Wait a minute. We object to that."

Mr. Beazley: "It is a part of the res gestæ."

Mr. Felts: "That is not a part of the res gestæ, and no self-serving declaration is admissible here."

Judge Shurley: "How is a declaration in his own interest admissible?"

Mr. Beazley: "If it is a part of the res gestæ, it makes no difference whether it was self-serving or otherwise."

Judge Shurley: "A self-serving declaration would be inadmissible, though it was a part of the res gestæ."

Mr. Beazley: "We insist that the answer to the question is admissible, in the first place, because it is a part of the res gestæ. For the second reason, we insist that it is admissible because this witness has said that Garnett Richards admitted shooting Julian Richards, and we certainly are entitled to the words that Garnett Richards used. * * * We would like to get this in the record, that we are insisting that we have a right to cross-examine this witness without limit as to how that admission was made and the language it was made in, and we except to the denial of the right to cross-examine the witness on that admission."

The court denied the right to the defendant to cross-examine the witness on how, when, and in what manner Garnett Richards admitted shooting Julian Richards.

It was error for the court to deny to the accused and his counsel the privilege of full and complete cross-examination of the witness who had testified to the admission. The admission, standing alone, tended to fix upon the accused the crime of murder with which he was charged. From an admission of a fatal shooting there follows the inference of guilt, unless in that connection the party making the admission states some matter of excuse or alleviation. And if matters of excuse or alleviation are made as a part of the statement admitting the homicide, then the presumption of guilt does not arise necessarily from the admission, as it does where the bare fact of the homicide is admitted and no facts that palliated its commission are stated. The fact that such matters may have been self-serving declarations would not, if stated in connection with the incriminating admission which was introduced by the state, exclude them from evidence.

"When an admission is given in evidence, it is the right of the other party to have the whole admission and all the conversation connected therewith." Penal Code (1910), § 1030.

"Where one side elicits a part of a conversation, that the other side are entitled to all that was said at the time in the same conversation is too well settled to be doubted or questioned." Betts v. State, 66 Ga. 509 (5).

We will not multiply quotations of authorities on this question. We do not rule that anything said in connection with the killing at the time of making the admission by the accused would necessarily have been a part of the res gestæ; but it was admissible, independently of whether it was a part of the res gestæ or not. The error of the court here pointed out is not cured by the fact that in a cross-examination of this witness he did testify:

"He [the accused] just says, 'I'm sorry I done it, but I told you I done it.' That's all the words he used right then, connected with those utterances. That's all I heard him say while I was there. He said, 'I'm sorry I done it, but I told you I would do it.' He didn't state along there, also, that 'you forced me to do it, and you're to blame.' I have told you all he said while I was there, and that's all I know about it. Just like awhile ago, I can't tell you how long I stayed in the room after I first got there without going out; everybody was so excited and coming in there; it might have been four minutes, and it might have been twenty. It wasn't less than four minutes, and it wasn't over twenty."

tion would not have elicited anything further in favor of the accused, it cannot be said that upon full cross-examination other matters might not have been elicited. Upon cross-examination the defendant's counsel would have had the right to propound leading questions—questions which would have called attention to matters that had passed out of the witness' mind and which would have refreshed his memory. At any rate the plain statement is certified to by the court, that defendant's counsel by the ruling of the court was denied the right to cross-examine the witness on "how, when, and in what manner Garnett Richards admitted shooting Julian Richards." The right to cross-examine has always been recognized as a most valuable right to the accused upon his trial, and the deprivation of this privilege, where it is properly claimed, as in the present case, is ground for the grant of a new trial.

Having held that a new trial will be granted upon that ground of the motion just disposed of, it is unnecessary to pass upon the question made by the exception to the court's overruling of the motion for a continuance of the case, which was made by the defendant, and also upon the question made by the challenge to the array of the jurors, as these questions are not likely to arise upon another trial. None of the other grounds of the motion show cause for the grant of a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

NEVILLE v. STATE. (No. 2639.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ~~§~~ 13, 132—Act prohibiting manufacture not superseded by Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Act.

The act to amend and supplement the prohibition laws of this state (Acts 1917 [Ex. Sess.] p. 7), which, among other provisions, made "it unlawful to distill, manufacture, or make any alcoholic, spirituous, vinous, or malted liquors or intoxicating beverages in this state," was not superseded and in effect repealed by the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and the Volstead Act (Act Cong. Oct. 28, 1919, c. 85, 41 Stat. 805). Smith v. State, 150 Ga. 755, 106 S. E. 364, and cases cited; Barbour v. Benton and Raskin v. Dixon, 151 Ga. —, 108 S. E. 61; *Com. v. 2. Former decision not overruled.

The request to review and overrule Smith v. State, supra, and the former decisions of this court there cited, is denied.

3. Criminal law ~~§~~ 93—State courts have jurisdiction of prosecution for unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquors.

In view of the rulings above announced, it was not error to overrule a general demurrer to the indictment charging the defendant with the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquors in a given county of the state, nor to strike a plea seeking to set up want of jurisdiction in the state court to try the defendant for the offense charged.

4. Verdict authorized.

The evidence authorized the verdict.

2. Sales ~~§~~ 384(2)—Seller held entitled to recover difference between contract price and market price as of certain date.

Where defendant accepted one carload of ice cream cones in part performance of a contract to take three carloads before August 1, 1919, and requested plaintiff to hold up shipment of the other two carloads until it should receive shipping instructions, and no shipping instructions were given, and on August 11, 1920, defendant refused definitely to accept shipment of the remaining two cars, plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the market value of the cones on August 11, 1920.

BLOODWORTH, J. Gabriel L. Saka-keeney sued the Chatham Ice Cream Company, alleging in part that in April, 1919, the Ice Cream Company entered into a contract with him for three carloads of ice cream cones at $4.25 per thousand, f. o. b. cars St. Louis, Mo., each car to contain 600 cases, and each case to contain 1,000 cones, the same to be delivered by August 1, 1919, and shipment to be made at any time between the date of the order and August 1, 1919, in carload lots only; that plaintiff shipped in May one carload of cones, as provided for in the contract, which carload was received and accepted by the defendant in part performance of the contract; that on June 9, 1919, the plaintiff communicated with the defendant, informing the defendant that the other two cars were ready for shipment, and desiring to know when defendant wished the shipment to go forward; that the defendant answered by calling attention to the fact that some of its machines had not been installed, that it had no room to store additional cones, and requested that the shipment of the two cars be held up until advice from it as to when they should be shipped; that pursuant to said instructions the plaintiff held the two cars ready for shipment on the defendant's demand; that the plaintiff did not receive shipping instructions during 1919, and did on May 22, 1920, call attention to the two cars it was holding for shipment under the contract; that the defendant then disclaimed any knowledge of said order; that the plaintiff then, through his attorneys, submitted the contracts to the defendant, and on August 11, 1920, the defendant "refused definitely to accept shipment of the remaining two cars, and have refused to make any settlement therefor"; that "during August, 1920, and at the time of [the] aforesaid breach of contract, cones of the kind contracted for were selling for and at [the] market value in St. Louis of $3 per thousand or $1.25 per thousand less than the contract price," and that "as a result of the facts herein set forth, * * * petitioner has been specially damaged in the sum of $1,500, with interest on the same from August 11, 1920."

Carriers §—88—Delivery to drayman held a delivery to consignee.

This was a suit for the value of certain shipments of freight which had been placed in the hands of the defendant as carrier for delivery to the plaintiff, which it was alleged the defendant failed to deliver to the plaintiff. The defendant claimed delivery to a drayman as the agent of the plaintiff and sought to prove the agency by a course of dealing. The only issue in the case was whether or not the shipments had been delivered to a person (the drayman) authorized by the plaintiff to receive them from the defendant, and whether or not the defendant, by a course of dealing with the plaintiff, had a right to depend upon their delivery to this alleged agent of the plaintiff. There was evidence to support the verdict, and the charge of the court was not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned.

2. Sales §—176(5)—No recovery of purchase price, in absence of continuing tender of fraudulently substituted automobile.

No recovery of damages in the amount of the entire purchase money paid for an automobile, based on alleged fraudulent substitution of an old car for a new one purchased, could be had in the absence of a tender back of the old car and a continuing tender or holding of the car for the benefit of the defendant seller, and buyer could not continue to use the car for 15 months before action, and then attempt to set off cost of repairs against the use.

Error from City Court of Swainsboro; Geo. Kirkland, Jr., Judge.

Action by A. L. Sutton against F. A. Coleman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The petition, as amended, alleges that the plaintiff in April, 1918, at night and at his home, bought from defendant a new automobile; that "the trade between plaintiff and defendant was fully executed at the time the trade was made;" that—

"(3) Defendant, after making said sale, told your petitioner that he would deliver the car on the following morning, as he would have to use same to return home that night.

"(4) On the following morning defendant delivered to your petitioner a car of the same make and size, but a different car altogether from the one petitioner had bought. The car delivered was an old car polished over. It was a car that had been much used, and was badly worn and almost useless to your petitioner.

"(5) Petitioner is old, and inexperienced in automobiles, and did not detect that a substitution of cars had been made by defendant until a few days after said car had been delivered to him. He discovered this by parts of the automobile giving away, and upon examination found that the automobile was worn out, and that it would not give service without expensive repairs being made.

"(6) As soon as petitioner discovered that a substitution had been made, as aforesaid, he called to see defendant and insisted that he take the car back, but defendant refused to do so.

"(7) Petitioner avers that the expense of repairs and the purchase price of new parts necessary to put said car in running condition have been of greater value than the value of the service he has received from said automobile, and that he has therefore been damaged in the full amount of the purchase price paid for said car, to wit, $1,550, for which amount plaintiff sues."

The petition was dismissed on oral motion, and the plaintiff excepted.

T. N. Brown, of Swainsboro, for plaintiff in error.

F. H. Saffold, of Swainsboro, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] This is not a suit for damages because of the breach of an implied warranty, but is one brought to recover the entire purchase money paid for the automobile, and is based upon the alleged fraudulent substitution of the car, which was "an old car polished over," and which "had been much used and was badly worn, and almost useless to" the plaintiff, for the car which he purchased and which was "new and in good condition." In such a case as this, before the petition would authorize a recovery, it should show that a valid tender of the article purchased was made to the seller upon discovery of the fraud. Granting, but not conceding, that the allegation in the petition, that "as soon as petitioner discovered that the substitution had been made, as aforesaid, he called to see defendant and insisted that he take the car back, but defendant refused to do so," amounted to a tender, yet the plaintiff lost all right he had to rely upon a tender when he did not make it a continuing one and hold the car for the benefit of the seller, but, on the contrary, continued to use it as his own property, and did not bring suit until about 15 months after the date the car was delivered to him, and then attempted to set off the cost of repairs against the use of the car. See Fortson v. Strickland, 23 Ga. App. 608 (2), 99 S. E. 147; Gray v. Angier, 62 Ga. 596.

The petition as amended does not set out a cause of action, and the court did not err in sustaining a motion to dismiss it.

BLAKELY MULE CO. v. LEWIS et al. (No. 12194.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 6, 1921.)

1. Instructions—No error.

The charge upon the contention of the plaintiff, as set out in the fourth ground of the motion for a new trial, was not error.

2. Chattel mortgages $\S$ 262(3)—Purchase by mortgagee only voidable.

In charging the jury as to a purchase by the plaintiff at its own sale of the defendant's mules for the account of the defendants, the court erred in stating that such a sale would be "void."

A sale of the kind in question would be merely voidable.

3. Instructions—Harmless error.

The excerpts from the charge as to the amount and form of the verdict, which are complained of in the sixth and seventh grounds of the motion for a new trial, are erroneous, but in view of the verdict rendered are harmless.

Error from City Court of Miller County; W. I. Geer, Judge.

Action by the Blakely Mule Company against C. M. Lewis and another. From a judgment for an insufficient amount, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. W. McMullin and C. M. Lewis executed to Blakely Mule Company three promissory notes. After certain payments had been made in cash on one of the notes the company gave notice of intent to sue upon the notes and for attorney's fees provided for therein, and suit was accordingly brought. By amendment all reference to one of the notes was stricken from the petition; the petition was further amended:

"By adding an additional paragraph, immediately following paragraph 6, to be known as paragraph 7 as follows: 'That a credit on the indebtedness evidenced by the two above-described notes of $275 is hereby admitted, the same being of date January 1, 1915, the said credit arising from the sale by plaintiff of four mules for the account of the defendants, said sale being at auction to the highest bidder and being had by direction of said defendants.'"

Separate pleas were filed, in each of which the defendants admitted that they signed the notes sued on and that the plaintiff was the holder and owner thereof, but denied that the sale of the mules at auction was made by their consent as stated in the amendment to the petition, and alleged that the mules were sold without notice to them, and were bid in by the plaintiff for $275, and that at the time of the sale the mules were—

"reasonably worth on the market $590, and that defendant is entitled to a credit of $590 on said notes for said four mules which he returned."

A verdict was rendered against both defendants for $132.90 as principal, $56.60 as interest, and $18.20 as attorney's fees. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and it excepted.

W. G. Park, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error.

N. L. Stapleton, of Colquitt, for defendants in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] Only the ruling stated in the second headnote will be discussed. The charge there referred to was as follows:

"On the other hand, I charge you this: If you believe from the testimony in the case that Lewis and McMullen and the Blakely Mule Company, who are the plaintiffs in this case, executed this paper, and that there was a sale made under it, and that the Blakely Mule Company purchased at that sale the property referred to in that paper, that that sale would be void. I charge you, further, that even though you believe that Lewis and McMullen signed that paper, and it should develop on the trial of this case, from the testimony, that under that paper the mules were sold that are referred to therein, and that the Blakely Mule Company purchased these mules, that the sale would be void."

This charge was error, and requires the grant of a new trial. Such a sale would not be void, but voidable only. In Payton v. McPhaul, 128 Ga. 511, (4), 58 S. E. 50, 11 Ann. Cas. 163, it was held that—"The general rule is that the mortgagee cannot be a purchaser at his own sale under the power in the mortgage, but a purchase by him is not absolutely void, but voidable only, at the instance of the mortgagor or the owner of the equity of redemption."

In Standback v. Thornton, 106 Ga. 81, on page 82, 31 S. E. 805 on page 806, Judge Cobb said:

"While the general rule is that no trustee can purchase trust property at his own sale, and therefore a mortgagee cannot purchase property at a sale which is held under an execution of the power authorizing such sale, unless the mortgage expressly authorizes him to become a bidder and purchaser at the sale, still an unauthorized purchase by the mortgagee will not render the sale void, but only voidable at the instance of the mortgagor, who has a right to elect to set aside the sale, provided he offer to redeem at the time that he so elect."

See, also, Palmer v. Young, 96 Ga. 246 (2), 22 S. E. 928, 51 Am. St. Rep. 136.

It does not appear that prior to the filing of the suit in this case, or in their pleadings, the defendants offered to redeem the property. Under the facts and the pleadings in this case, the general rule above referred to is applicable. The court erred in overruling the motion for new trial.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Limitation of actions §199(1) — Whether mutual accounts exist is a question of fact.

The controlling question presented in this record is whether mutual accounts existed between the parties, and it was a question of fact for determination by the jury. See *Gunn v. (Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Oct. 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$ 302(3)—Document introduced should be set out in motion for new trial.

A ground of a motion for new trial, assigning error on the admission in evidence, over stated objections of movant, of a document, which is neither set out literally or in substance in the motion, nor attached thereto as an exhibit properly identified, but is merely referred to as set out in the brief of evidence, presents no question for decision.

2. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$ 302(1)—Ground of motion for new trial must be complete.

3. Trial  $\Leftrightarrow$ 85—Objection to evidence good in part insufficient.

Where evidence is offered, some of which is admissible and some not, objection to the evidence as a whole is not well taken.

4. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$ 302(3)—Ground of motion for new trial held incomplete.

Nothing was presented for review in the appellate court by a ground of a motion for new trial complaining that certain testimony of a certain person in reference to certain notes and a contract made by him with a certain company was admitted in evidence, where such person was not identified by the ground, further than as a witness for the defendant, and it was not shown what relation he bore to either of the parties to the case, what connection the aforesaid company had with the parties, or in what manner the contract and notes were related to the case.

W. W. Dykes, of Americus, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] "A ground of a motion for new trial assigning error on the admission of evidence, over stated objections of movant, of a document which is neither set out literally or in substance in the motion nor attached thereto as an exhibit properly identified, but is merely referred to as set out in the brief of evidence, presents no question for decision. Ford v. Blackshear Mfg. Co., 140 Ga. 670, 79 S. E. 576." Perry v. Monroe, 150 Ga. 26 (2), 102 S. E. 356.

[2] "Grounds of a motion for new trial, which are incomplete, and cannot be understood without resorting to an examination of the brief of evidence, fail to present any question for decision. Head v. State, 144 Ga. 383, 87 S. E. 273; Sims v. Sims, 131 Ga. 262, 62 S. E. 192; Smiley v. Smiley, 144 Ga. 546, 87 S. E. 668; Daniel v. Schwarzwelss, 144 Ga. 81, 86 S. E. 239." Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Stovall-Pace Co., 24 Ga. App. 248 (3b), 100 S. E. 657.

[3] "Where evidence is offered, some of which is admissible and some not, objection to the evidence as a whole is not well taken. That which is inadmissible should be pointed out, and objection made to it separately. Ray v. Camp, 110 Ga. 818, 36 S. E. 242; Collins & C. R. Co. v. Ware, 112 Ga. 663, 37 S. E. 975; Branch v. Branch, 139 Ga. 375, 77 S. E. 386." Fambrough v. De Vane, 141 Ga. 794 (3), 82 S. E. 249. See, also, Bacon v. Dannenberg Co., 24 Ga. App. 540 (7), 101 S. E. 699.

Applying the above general rules to the amendment to the motion for a new trial, it is evident that this court is not called upon to consider any of them, because—

[4] (a) The first of these grounds complains that certain testimony of W. G. Hooks in reference to certain notes and the contract made by him with the Partin Manufacturing Company was admitted in evidence. Hooks is not identified by this ground further than as a witness for the defendant. It is not shown what relation he bore to either of the parties to the case, what connection the Partin Manufacturing Company had with the parties, or how or in what manner the contract and notes referred to in this ground were related to the case.

(b) The second ground complains of the "admission of all the testimony and evidence of W. G. Hooks, witness for the defendant, as set out in said brief of evidence." The sixth ground alleges error "because all of the evidence and testimony of J. E. Tanner, as shown by the brief of evidence filed herewith, was illegally admitted to the jury by the court over the objections of movant." To determine what evidence was referred to in these grounds of the motion for a new trial would require reference to the brief of evidence.

(c) The third ground complains that certain letters which were attached to the brief of evidence were "illegally admitted to the jury." Ground 4 alleges error "because the carbon copies of letters, copies of which are attached to said brief of evidence, were illegally admitted to the jury by the court over the objections of movant." Ground 7 alleges that the court erred "because the contract between the Partin Manufacturing Company and the defendant, dated Dec. 9, 1916, copy of which is attached to said brief of evidence, was illegally admitted to the jury by the court over the objections of movant." Neither the contract nor any of the letters referred to in these grounds are "set out literally or in substance in the motion or attached thereto as an exhibit properly identified," but they are "merely referred to as set out in the brief of evidence."

(d) The fifth ground of the motion alleges error in admitting certain evidence of J. E. Tanner relative to a Miss Whallen, and a conversation between her and W. G. Hooks in reference to certain notes which she was attempting to collect for the Partin Manufacturing Company. It is not shown what notes were referred to, or what connection, if any, that company had with this case. To ascertain this would require reference to the brief of evidence.

There was evidence to support the verdict, the trial judge approved it, and this court will not interfere.

Judgment affirmed.

Certiorari  $\S$  70(8)—Landlord and tenant  $\S$  119(1, 2), 120(1)—Tenant becomes tenant at sufferance after expiration of term; no claim that judgment was contrary to evidence where conflicting.

While a tenant for an agreed term after the expiration of his contract or a tenant at will after the two months' statutory notice by his landlord (Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  3709) becomes a tenant at sufferance, and continues as such until there has been some affirmative action by the landlord which has the effect of converting the tenancy into some other form (Willis v. Harrell, 118 Ga. 906, 45 S. E. 794), yet where the undisputed evidence shows that the tenancy was one at will, and the evidence is in conflict as to whether the statutory notice to vacate was given within the required time before the filing of eviction proceedings under sections 5385 et seq. of Civil Code 1910, the order of a judge of the superior court refusing to sanction a writ of certiorari for the review of a judgment for the tenant will not be reversed, when the sole ground of the petition for certiorari is that the judgment was contrary to the evidence. BLOODWORTH, J. [1, 2] A search warrant was issued by a justice of the peace upon the affidavit of Charlie Johnson, who swore that Mrs. M. J. Hearrell and Enoch Hearrell were in possession of certain property belonging to him. By virtue of the authority given by the search warrant the property described therein was seized by K. S. Vann, bailliff. The Hearrells defended, and, upon the issue being tried by the justice of the peace, he passed an order awarding the property to Johnson. Acting under this order, and without any notice of the intention on the part of the Hearrells to apply for a writ of certiorari, the bailliff promptly delivered to Johnson the property in dispute. Nearly 30 days thereafter the Hearrells obtained a writ of certiorari, and the judge of the superior court, upon hearing the case, reversed the decision of the justice of the peace awarding the property to Johnson, and the bailliff was ordered to turn it over to the Hearrells. After this judgment of the superior court a rule was issued against the bailliff, Vann, he made answer thereto, and, upon the hearing of the issue thus raised the court refused to make the rule absolute, and the Hearrells excepted. The court did not err in refusing to make the rule against the bailliff absolute. See Seamans v. King, 79 Ga. 611, 5 S. E. 53; Johnson v. Fox, 51 Ga. 270; Wilbur v. Stokes, 117 Ga. 545, 43 S. Oct. 7, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Partnership  $\S$ 217(1)—No burden under plea of payment to prove partner's authority to receive payment on written evidence of debt.

The rule of law that, where payment upon a written evidence of debt is made to one who purports to act as the holder's agent, but fails to produce the writing, the burden is upon the debtor to prove the agent's authority to receive the payment (Civil Code of 1910,  $\S$  3578), has no application where payment on a note payable to a partnership is made to one of the partners. In such a case, upon proof of the partnership, the payment is binding against it, even though the paper itself was not produced at the time the payment was made. Civ. Code 1910,  $\S\S$  3172, 3179, 3180.

2. Partnership  $\S$ 49—Relation may be established by statements or admissions of partners.

Where, under a plea of payment, the sole issue is that of partnership or no partnership, as pertaining to the person to whom the payment was made, the admissions of the disputed partner, unassented to or unratified, would not of themselves be ordinarily admissible for the purpose of proving the fact of partnership, so as to bind the undisputed partners; yet partnership or no partnership is a fact which may be established by statements or admissions of the undisputed partners, or by statements of the disputed partner made in their presence and not dissented from by them, where the circumstances are such as to impose a duty to make denial. Flournoy v. Williams, 68 Ga. 707; Swygert v. Bank of Haralson, 13 Ga. App. 640, 79 S. E. 759.

3. Partnership  $\S$ 259—Existence of partnership presumed to continue.

The existence of a copartnership when once established is presumed, as to third persons, to continue until notice of dissolution has been given that the copartnership no longer exists. Civ. Code 1910,  $\S\S$  3157, 3179, 3180; Pursley v. Ramsey, 31 Ga. 403, 409; Fleshman v. Collier, 47 Ga. 253, 256, 257; Reliance Fertilizer Co. v. Perry, 23 Ga. App. 580, 583, 99 S. E. 44.

1. Sales  $\S$ 202(1)—Title does not pass until payment.

Title to agricultural products sold by planters and commission merchants does not pass to the buyer until fully paid for. Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  4126.

2. Payment  $\S$ 21—Check not payment until paid.

A check is not payment until it is paid, unless the payee accepts it as such. Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  4314; Butler v. Barnes, 8 Ga. App. 513, 69 S. E. 923; Holland v. Mutual Fertilizer Co., 8 Ga. App. 714, 70 S. E. 151; Kirby Planing Mill Co. v. Titus, 14 Ga. App. 1(1), 80 S. E. 13.

3. Payment  $\S$ 21—Check not payment until paid.

Applying the foregoing principles to the instant case, which was a trover action to recover a carload of melons, the plaintiff had no title to the property sued for, since the undisputed evidence adduced upon the trial shows that the check given by him to the defendant (a farmer) for the purchase price of the melons was neither accepted as payment nor cashed; and therefore the verdict in favor of the plaintiff must be set aside as being contrary to law and the evidence.

- 2. Attorney and client ¶74—Trial court could hear evidence on plea of abatement that attorney appearing in firm name did not represent client.

Where defendant made special appearance and filed plea in abatement on the ground that an attorney, whose name appeared in the firm name signed to the petition, had represented defendant and could not appear against him, court had a right to hear evidence offered to show that the name of such attorney was signed to the petition through mistake, and that the law partnership of such attorney and the attorney representing the plaintiff was not to begin and did not exist until some time thereafter, and to enter an order denying the plea in abatement and ordering the name of such attorney stricken from the petition.

- 3. Attorney and client ¶21—Attorney on one side of litigation not allowed to represent opponent in subsequent cases.

An attorney who acquires knowledge of the affairs of another pending the relationship of attorney and client between them cannot use such knowledge afterwards to the detriment of his former client.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by S. J. Morris against J. L. Johnson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Morris sued Johnson for damages on account of personal injuries. The defendant made a special appearance before pleading to the merits, and filed a plea in abatement. This plea in abatement was verified by the oath of the defendant. No responsive pleadings were filed by the plaintiff, and there was no attempt to amend the petition. On the hearing of the plea in abatement the trial judge considered the following evidence: C. H. Porter, of the firm of Porter & Mebane, stated in his place, as an attorney at law of the court, that the name of that firm was signed by him to the petition through mistake; that Mr. Mebane, his partner, had no connection with the case whatever, and that he (Porter) was alone attorney for the plaintiff, S. J. Morris; that the partnership of Porter & Mebane was not to begin and did not exist until January 1, 1921; and that the petition was filed in December, 1920. W. B. Mebane testified that he had no interest whatever in the case on trial; that the defendant never consulted him, never employed him, and no one ever employed him for the plaintiff; that he did not bring the suit for the plaintiff, did not draft or prepare the petition, knew nothing about the suit going to be brought, did not authorize any one to bring the suit for him or in his name, and had no connection whatever with the suit, and that he first knew of the suit when informed by the defendant that it had been brought; that he then told the defendant that he did not bring the suit and that it was an error for his name to be attached to the suit as counsel, and at the same time he so told Harris, the attorney for the defendant.

The court thereupon entered an order overruling and denying the plea in abatement, and ordered that the name of W. B. Mebane be stricken from the petition and that the case proceed in the name of C. H. Porter. To this order and judgment the defendant excepted on the following grounds: (1) Because the ruling and judgment was contrary to law; (2) because it was contrary to the evidence, strongly and decidedly against the weight of the evidence, and has no evidence whatever to support it; (3) because it was contrary to the principles of equity and justice; (4) because the court erred in admitting in evidence the statement of C. H. Porter and the evidence of W. B. Mebane to the effect that W. B. Mebane was not attorney for the plaintiff, S. J. Morris, and that his name was signed to the petition through inadvertence, the objection of counsel for the defendant being that it was contrary to public policy to allow an attorney who appeared as attorney for the plaintiff to deny his appearance or to avoid the effect of his appearance; (5) because as it appeared from undisputed evidence that W. B. Mebane was not authorized to appear in or to present or prosecute the petition against the defendant, the firm of Porter & Mebane could not appear in or present or prosecute such petition; (6) because the judge of the superior court cannot by his order name parties who appear as attorneys for the parties; and (7) because, as this question is not raised by demurrer but was raised by special appearance for the purpose of pleading in abatement only, it was impossible for the pleadings to be made good, either by amendment or evidence, after it was made to appear that W. B. Mebane was disqualified from appearing in said case.

C. H. Porter, of Rome, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] We are of the opinion that there is no merit in any of the foregoing assignments of error. The judge of the trial court clearly had a right to hear the evidence offered, and this evidence clearly established the fact that the foundation upon which all of the assignments of error are based did not in fact exist; in other words, that the relationship of attorney and client between Mebane and the plaintiff did not exist and had never existed as claimed by the plea in abatement. Of course, it is well settled, and based upon the very highest ethical principles, that an attorney who acquires knowledge of the affairs of another pending the relationship of attorney and client between them cannot use such knowledge afterwards to the detriment of his former client, and that an attorney who has been on one side of litigation will not be allowed to take a position in subsequent cases where the knowledge derived from his former client might be used to the prejudice of such client. The inherent weakness of the position of the plaintiff in error is that this well-established principle did not apply under the undisputed facts of this case, and that every objection made to the order of the court is purely technical and entirely without substantial merit. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

JOHNSON v. STAR PIANO CO. (No. 12520.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Oct. 6, 1921.)

Attorney and client § 101(1), 103—Attorney cannot make settlement for less sum than that due, unless ratification is shown.

In this case the defendant sought to avoid the payment of a note by showing settlement with an attorney for less than was due thereon. The principle involved is settled by section 4956 of the Civil Code of 1910. In Kaiser & Brother v. Hancock, 106 Ga. 217, 32 S. E. 123, it was held: "Without special authority, an attorney cannot accept anything in discharge of his client's claim, but the full amount thereof in cash. And where a plaintiff introduces evidence which makes out a prima facie case in his favor for the full amount for which he sues, proof by the defendant, in support of a plea filed by him, that he has paid to the attorney of record for the plaintiff a sum less than the amount sued for, as a full settlement of the plaintiff's demand against him, raises no presumption that the attorney was authorized by the plaintiff to make such a settlement. Consequently, under such circumstances, the burden is upon the defendant to show the authority of the plaintiff's attorney to make the settlement which he sets up as a satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim." Of course, if it were shown that the plaintiff, with a full knowledge of all the facts, received and kept the money paid in settlement, this would be a ratification of the settlement made by their attorney, and would be binding on the plaintiff. See, also, Sonneborn v. Moore, 105 Ga. 497(1), 80 S. E. 947; Evans v. Atlantic National Bank of Jacksonville et al., 147 Ga. 621(1), 95 S. E. 219; Bell & Harrell v. Kwilecki, 11 Ga. (Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bills and notes § 327—"Draft" defined; bona fide holder for value protected.

"A draft is an open letter of request from, and an order by, one person on another to pay a sum of money therein mentioned to a third person, on demand or at a future time therein specified. A 'draft' at the present day is the common term for all bills of exchange. The words 'draft' and 'bill of exchange' are used indiscriminately." 3 Words and Phrases, First Series, p. 2196. The fact that a paper in the above form, accepted by the person on whom it is drawn, is called a "trade acceptance" does not affect its character as a draft or bill of exchange. Whatever it may be called, it is in fact and law a negotiable instrument, and, as such, is protected in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, who purchased it before it was due and without notice of any defect or defense by the maker, acceptor, or indorser, except as to the defenses expressly allowed by the statute. Civ. Code 1910, § 4286.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Draft.]

2. Bills and notes  $\Leftarrow$ 370, 487(1)—Bona fide holder protected against defense of acceptor of lack of consideration; presumed that holder took draft before due for value and without notice.

A bona fide holder of a draft or bill of exchange, accepted by the person on whom it is drawn and indorsed by the payee, and purchased for value and before maturity, is protected against the defense set up by the acceptor that the draft or bill of exchange was without consideration, and when such negotiable paper is payable at a future date and is indorsed by the payee, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the law will presume that the holder took the draft or bill of exchange before due, for value and without notice. Civ. Code 1910, § 4288; Butler v. First National Bank of Greenville, Tenn., 18 Ga. App. 35, 78 S. E. 772; Bothell v. Whitley, 8 Ga. App. 755(2, 3), 60 S. E. 371.

3. Bills and notes  $\Leftarrow$ 342—Words printed on face held not to impeach title of bona fide purchaser.

The words printed on the face of the draft, "trade acceptance," and "this obligation of the acceptor arises out of the purchase of goods from the drawer," were not sufficient to raise any doubt as to the real character of the instrument or impeach the title of the holder. They emphasized the negotiable character of the instrument and its binding effect upon the acceptor.

4. Drafts—Effect of indorsements.

None of the entries on the face and back of the instrument, made by the officers of the plaintiff bank and other banks through whose hands it had passed in the effort to collect it from the defendant as acceptor, affected the bona fides of the plaintiff's title.

5. Testimony—Admissibility.

The assignments of error on the rulings relating to the admissibility of testimony specifically set out in grounds 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 of the amended motion for a new trial are without substantive merit.

6. Petition—Demurrers.

The judgment overruling the demurrers to the petition was right.

7. Verdict for plaintiff demanded.

The numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial contain no merit that would have warranted the grant of another trial. The evidence clearly and conclusively proved that the plaintiff had purchased the instrument in good faith, for value, before maturity, and without any notice that it was without consideration. The denial of these facts by the acceptor of the paper as defendant was not sustained by any evidence. A verdict for plaintiff was therefore demanded. Parr v. Erickson, 115 Ga. 873, 42 S. E. 240.

2. Principal and agent  $\Leftarrow$ 47—Owner of wood yard held not entitled to sell without paying commissions.

Where defendant gave plaintiff management of wood yard and full control thereof, in consideration of which plaintiff was to receive 15 per cent. of gross proceeds of both wood and lumber, held, that defendant was not entitled to sell wood or lumber without being liable for commissions, notwithstanding Civ. Code 1910, § 3587.

3. Contracts  $\Leftarrow$ 10(2)—Unilateral contract rendered mutual by performance.

Where plaintiff, under the terms of a contract to take over control of a wood yard and sell wood and lumber for a commission, "took over the active management of said E. wood yard and fully performed the services as required by said contract," the contract was divested of any unilateral character that it possessed, and was made mutual.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by C. W. Barber against E. Ness. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McIntire, Walsh & Bernstein, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Saussy & Saussy and J. T. Wells, Jr., all of Savannah, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. As much of the petition as amended as is necessary to determine the issues involved is as follows:

"(2) On October 31, 1919, your petitioner entered into a written contract with E. Ness, a copy of which is hereto attached, marked Exhibit A, * * * whereby said E. Ness was to turn over to your petitioner the management of a wood yard in Macon, Bibb county, Georgia, known as the E. Ness wood yard, said contract to take effect November 1, 1919. O. W. Barber to have full control and management of said wood yard, and to receive for his services 15 per cent. of the gross proceeds of both wood and lumber sold in any form from above-mentioned wood yard, as long as he, O. W. Barber, devoted his time to same.

"(3) On or about November 1, 1919, under the terms of said contract, your petitioner took over the active management of said E. Ness wood yard, and fully performed all services as required by said contract.

"(4, as amended) Petitioner further shows that on or about December 15, 1919, said E. Ness sold all of the wood and lumber in the said wood yard to one W. T. Morgan for the sum of $4,000; that under the terms of said contract your petitioner is entitled to 15 per cent. of the gross proceeds of said sale, as commission, to wit, $600. Said E. Ness has failed and refused, and still fails and refuses to pay said $600.

"(5) Your petitioner further shows that said E. Ness has broken said contract, in that he has failed and refused to pay said commission of fifteen (15%) per cent., which amounts to $600, and because of said breach of contract on the part of E. Ness your petitioner has been damaged in the sum of $600, together with interest from December 15, 1919."

Exhibit A:

"Bibb County, Macon, Georgia,
"October 31, 1919.

"Contract. I hereby agree to turn over management of wood yard known as E. Ness wood yard, to O. W. Barber. Said O. W. Barber to have full control of said wood yard. In consideration of his services said O. W. Barber is to receive 15 per cent. of gross proceeds of both wood and lumber that is sold in any form from above-mentioned wood yard, as long as he devotes his time to said wood yard. Said O. W. Barber to have management of said wood yard until all wood and lumber is disposed of. Contract to take effect November 1, 1919.

"[Signed] E. Ness."

The defendant filed the following demurrer:

"(1) That the said petition sets forth no cause of action in favor of said plaintiff against this defendant.

"(2) That the said petition does not show what portion of said wood yard which was sold to said W. T. Morgan consisted of wood and lumber and what portion consisted of property other than wood and lumber."

[1, 2] The petition, as amended, met the objection urged against it in the second ground of the demurrer, and leaves the general ground only for our consideration. Plaintiff in error insists that under the facts of this case, as shown by the petition and the contract attached thereto, he had a right to sell the property himself, and, if he did so, that he would not be responsible for commissions. It is true that section 3587 of the Code of 1910 provides that "the fact that property is placed in the hands of a broker to sell, does not prevent the owner from selling, unless otherwise agreed," but the statements of the petition and the contract itself differentiate this case from those covered by the general principle "that the owner may sell without being liable for commissions."

[3] Plaintiff in error urges, also, that the contract, a copy of which is attached to the petition, is unilateral. The petition shows that the plaintiff, under the terms of the contract, "took over the active management of said E. Ness wood yard, and fully performed the services as required by said contract." This action of the plaintiff furnished the consideration contemplated by the contract and divested it of its unilateral character. In Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 171 (3), 46 S. E. 68, the Supreme Court said:

"It is well settled, however, that a unilateral contract, though required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, may be made mutual by the other party's doing some act which would take the case out of the statute, so far as he is concerned."

It is therefore held that the petition in this case set out a cause of action, and the court properly overruled the general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County: Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Georgian Company against Jennie Bloom. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order sustaining certiorari and ordering a new trial, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Georgian Company sued Jennie Bloom in the municipal court of Atlanta upon an open account for certain advertisements printed in a newspaper published by the company. The defendant filed a counterclaim, alleging:

That the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant; "that on June 9, 1920, she being in the ladies' ready to wear business, including the selling of furs, contracted with plaintiff to run an advertisement on that date as follows: 'Special in furs. Large animal scarfs, taupe, brown and black, satin lined into brush. For three days only. Special price $15.00'—the said advertisement to be run in plaintiff's newspaper. Plaintiff, in running said advertisement, did not carry out its contract with defendant, and insert the advertisement that she furnished them, but inserted the advertisement as follows: 'Special in furs. Large animal scarfs, taupe, brown and black satin lined into long brush. For three days only. Special price $5.00.' This advertisement as inserted made the difference $10 less in price than the advertisement which defendant furnished them and contracted with plaintiff to furnish. Defendant, because of said wrongful advertisement, says she was compelled to sell 48 of said scarfs at a loss of $10 each, that is, she was compelled to sell them at $5 instead of $15 to customers and persons who accepted her offer as made in said advertisement. Defendant says that, by reason of said advertisement published by plaintiff, she incurred a loss of $480. Plaintiff well knew that the purpose of said advertisement was to sell said scarfs at $15, but, instead of putting $15 in the advertisement, plaintiff advertised at $5 as aforesaid. Wherefore defendant prays judgment against plaintiff for said sum of $480."

It was admitted by counsel for the defendant that the account of the newspaper company sued upon was correct, subject, however, to the defendant's counterclaim. On the trial in the municipal court the judge thereof struck the counterclaim as being invalid, and a verdict and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for the amount of the account. The defendant carried the case to the superior court by writ of certiorari, and the judge of the superior court, after a hearing thereon, passed an order sustaining the certiorari and ordered a new trial. The case is before this court on exceptions to this order of the judge of the superior court.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] A general advertisement in a newspaper for the sale of an indefinite quantity of goods is a mere invitation to enter into a bargain, rather than an offer.

"A business advertisement published in newspapers and circulars sent out by mail or distributed by hand, stating that the advertiser has a certain quantity or quality of goods which he wants to dispose of at certain prices, are not offers which become contracts as soon as any person to whose notice they might come signifies his acceptance by notifying the other that he will take a certain quantity of them. They are mere invitations to all persons who may read them that the advertiser is ready to receive offers for the goods at the price stated." 13 C. J. 289, § 97.

"If goods are advertised for sale at a certain price * * * the construction is rather favored that such advertisement is a mere invitation to enter into a bargain, rather than an offer." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 27.

In the instant case the advertisement, which is the basis of the counterclaim, specified no definite quantity of the furs for sale, though there was a more or less indefinite description of the qualities of the goods. The first essential of a sale is that there must be "an identification of the thing sold." Civil Code (1910), § 4106. To consummate a contract there must be "a meeting of minds." There was no merit in the counterclaim filed by the defendant in the municipal court, and the judge of that court committed no error in striking it, and entering up judgment for the plaintiff. He had a right to do so at the trial term of the court, and the judge of the superior court erred in sustaining the certiorari and ordering a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

1. Damages ⇐214—Instructions as to duty to lessen damages proper.

A charge that "the plaintiff was bound to lessen the damages, if he was damaged by the negligence of defendant, as far as possible, by the use of ordinary care and diligence," was not error. Civil Code 1910, § 4396. Nor was it error to refuse to charge as to specified acts which the plaintiff should have done to lessen the damage. Southern Ry. Co. v. Cunningham, 123 Ga. 90 (7), 50 S. E. 979.

2. Appeal and error ⇐728(1) — Assignments to admission of evidence must show objection.

"Assignments of error upon the admission of evidence, in order to avail the plaintiff in error here, must show, not only in what respects the evidence admitted was objectionable, but that this objection was urged at the time of the admission of the evidence; and it is not sufficient, in a ground of a motion for new trial, to state that the court committed error 'in admitting in evidence over objection of movants,' certain specified evidence, and then, after stating the evidence admitted, to allege that it was error to admit this evidence, because it was incompetent for certain specified reasons. Such a recital in a ground of a motion for a new trial does not show that the ground upon which the evidence was objectionable was urged at the time the evidence was offered. The numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial complaining of the admission of testimony are insufficient to raise any question here, for the reason indicated." Hendlee v. Harper, 148 Ga. 621, 97 S. E. 667. See, also, Jenkins v. Jenkins, 150 Ga. 77 (1), 102 S. E. 425. HILL, J. This case involves the construction of a written contract made by the owner of the real estate described with a real estate agent or broker. In substance the contract is as follows:

"I authorize you, as my agent, to sell the above-described property, and agree to pay you a brokerage or $500.00, for negotiating, selling or exchanging the same or any part of same at the above price, or at any other price and terms to which I may hereafter agree. This authority is given for one month from date, and if sold by you or through your instrumentality or by any one else, during this time, I agree to pay $— brokerage. I further agree that if the above property is sold to any one with whom you have been negotiating, within six months after the expiration of this contract, that I will pay you $— commissions on sale, together with 10 per cent. as attorney's fees if collected by law."

The contract was duly signed by the owner. Suit was brought on the contract, and the petition contains two counts. The first count is based upon the first two sentences of the contract, and the cause of action therein laid was that the broker (the plaintiff), within one month from the date of the contract, found a purchaser, namely, J. F. Holmes, who was ready, willing, and able to buy the property and who offered to buy the same, for $7,000, and upon terms to which the owner, Ray, after the execution of the contract and during the negotiations, agreed to. The second count was based upon the last sentence of the contract, and proceeds upon the theory that the property described was actually sold within six months to the person named, with whom the broker had been negotiating, and that by reason thereof, under the terms of this portion of the contract, no specific amount being designated, but the agreement to pay being positive and definite, the owner was bound to pay the broker a reasonable sum for his services. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $250. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

[1, 2] The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial complains of the exclusion of the testimony of the owner of the property, the maker of the contract, as to his construction of the contract, and as to what was said and done between the two parties to the contract when it was made. As to this it is sufficient to say that, whether erroneous or not, the alleged error was cured by the action of the court in subsequently permitting the introduction of the testimony then excluded, and in instructing the jury as to its effect. It is well settled that where a court excludes evidence at one point in the trial, which is admissible, this is not sufficient cause for the granting of a new trial, where the evidence excluded is admitted at some other point in the case, and is permitted to go to the jury and be fully considered by it. This will also dispose of the argument that as the court had permitted the broker to testify as to the ambiguity of the contract and his construction of it, it was unfair not to permit the defendant to do so also. The record shows that the court permitted both the parties to testify fully on this subject.

[3] The second ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial assigns error on the following extract from the charge of the court:

"The court charges you that it would not be incumbent upon the plaintiff to show the trade was actually consummated by the passing of title deeds, but it would be incumbent upon him to show that there was an agreement made between the parties, the buyer and seller, and an enforceable agreement, one that either party could enforce, in order for him to recover, and that agreement, gentlemen, must be within the terms stipulated and the time named by the contract. The law places upon him the burden, before he would be entitled to recover, to furnish a buyer who is able, ready, and willing to buy the property in question; that is to say, that he must furnish a buyer who is able financially to buy and who is ready to buy, on the terms and stipulations named by the seller and who is willing to buy."

It is said that this charge is not adjusted to the issues as made by the pleadings and the evidence. We do not concur in this contention. The gist of the suit in this count is, not that the sale was actually consummated within one month from the date of the contract, but that within this time the broker had found a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to buy, and who actually offered to buy, upon the terms designated by the seller. It is not a proper or fair construction of the petition that a sale had been actually consummated by the broker, nor was the broker required to show this. By this part of the charge the court imposed upon the broker a heavier burden than he was required to carry under the pleadings and evidence; in other words, to show that he had actually made a sale. He was entitled to recover by showing a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy within the time limits of the contract. If any error was committed in this part of the charge, it was therefore an error committed against the plaintiff, and not the defendant, for it is well established that a broker's commissions are earned when, during the agency, he finds a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy, and who actually offers to buy, on the terms stipulated by the owner. Park's Code, § 3587. The failure to actually consummate the sale under the evidence, in view of the conduct of the owner, was not due to the fault of either the broker or the proposed purchaser. Nevertheless, if the broker produced a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy the property on the terms proposed, and who actually offered to buy, he would be entitled to recover the commissions. Humphries & Jackson v. Smith, 5 Ga. App. 340, 63 S. E. 248; Kesler v. Stulta, 15 Ga. App. 735, 84 S. E. 201.

[4-8] The third ground of the amendment to the motion complains of the charge of the court touching the liability of the defendant under the last sentence of the contract. This part of the contract fixes no time in which it was to be performed, and leaves blank the amount of commissions that would be paid in the event of its performance. Where a person enters into a contract to do an act, and no time is designated within which the act is to be performed, the law will imply and read into the contract that it should be performed within a reasonable time, and where an express agreement is made to pay for services, and the amount of payment is not designated, the law will imply a reasonable amount as compensation. 13 C. J. 585. The last portion of the contract is specific and definite, except as to the time of the performance and the amount of compensation. But no other reasonable construction can be placed upon the contract than that, if within a reasonable time the broker performed the services, he was entitled to reasonable compensation for his work. But the jury under the evidence may well have based their verdict upon that part of the contract which is to the effect that, if a sale is made within six months, and the broker has rendered services according to the contract within that time, and has produced a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy, he is entitled to be paid reasonable compensation. The jury, after finding that the services had been rendered as claimed (as they must have done in view of their verdict), fixed this compensation at $250. Certainly the broker was entitled to $500 as definitely fixed by the contract, or he was entitled to reasonable compensation as determined by the evidence as to the value of the services, and the defendant has no right to complain that he was required to pay less than he had really agreed to pay. The objections made to the excerpts from the charge were not well taken. The charge was fully adjusted to the evidence, and there was evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

The petition in this case consists of two counts, a demurrer to each of which was overruled. The brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error discusses the ruling on the demurrer as to the first count only. So the sole question for us to determine is whether or not the demurrer as to that count is good. That count gives a description of the notes sued for and states the balance due thereon and alleges that the notes were delivered by plaintiff to the defendant, the Citizens' Banking Company, which was to collect them and remit the net proceeds to the plaintiff, that the makers of the notes were solvent, and that the bank negligently and fraudulently converted the notes by delivering the same to the makers thereof without collecting the balance due thereon. The petition sets out a cause of action, and is sufficient to withstand a general demurrer, and a special demurrer on the ground that "it appears affirmatively from the petition in said case that the makers of said notes are solvent, and that the defendant in this case did not collect the money covered by notes which were delivered to maker by mistake or oversight," and that "plaintiff seems to have selected defendant against whom to bring suit, rather than institute proceedings against one of its customers." BLOODWORTH, J. [1] Only the ruling stated in the first headnote need be discussed. Hart & Crouse Company sued Mackle Construction Company, Wynne Plumbing Company, and W. H. Wynne. Mackle Construction Company alone defended. There was a verdict and judgment against all the parties. Mackle Construction Company, without joining the other defendants, made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and it brought the case to this court for review. The defendant in error filed a motion to dismiss the writ of error—"for the reason that two parties defendant in the lower court, who are interested in the final determination of this cause, are not made parties in this court, and were not served with the bill of exceptions herein."

In Turner v. Newell, 129 Ga. 89 (1), 58 S. E. 657, citing Ruffin v. Paris, 75 Ga. 653, and Jordan v. Gauden, 73 Ga. 191, it was held:

Code 1910, §§ 4355-4357), or by a bona fide public effort on the part of the plaintiff in fi. fa. to enforce his execution in the courts at such times and periods that seven years would not elapse between such attempts, or between such an attempt and a proper entry.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Bainbridge against A. L. McCaskill, executor, and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

On September 14, 1907, the plaintiff in error obtained judgment against Sam and Will Donalson as principals and W. E. Griffin as indorser. Execution was issued and was entered on the general execution docket on September 17, 1907. On September 8, 1912, this execution was levied, and on September 8, 1912, a claim to the property levied upon was filed and a forthcoming bond given, with J. C. McCaskill as principal and M. E. Nussbaum as security. The claim case was tried September 29, 1914, and a verdict rendered finding the property subject. The property was advertised for sale in June, 1915, and a portion of the property was produced at the sale. J. C. McCaskill died, and A. L. McCaskill qualified as his executor. On February 24, 1920, suit was filed on the forthcoming bond. Pleas were filed by both A. L. McCaskill, as executor, and M. E. Nussbaum. On the trial the court ruled out all the evidence offered by the plaintiff and granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

Jno. R. Wilson, of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error.

W. V. Custer and T. S. Hawes, both of Bainbridge, for defendants in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). The bill of exceptions recites that the plaintiff tendered in evidence the fi. fa. of the First National Bank of Bainbridge against Sam and Will Donalson, principals, and W. E. Griffin, indorser, dated and entered on the general execution docket September 17, 1907, with the entry of levy thereon, dated September 8, 1912, together with all other entries on the fi. fa. The defendants objected to this evidence "on the ground that the fi. fa. was dormant on the date that the property was advertised for sale, to wit, the first Tuesday in June, 1915, and said fi. fa. was dead before this suit was filed." The court sustained these objections and excluded the fi. fa. and entries thereon from the consideration of the jury. This court is therefore to determine whether or not the judgment was dormant in June, 1915. Were this case of first impression we would say that this question is settled by the plain and unambiguous words of the statute. However, under a number of rulings of the Supreme Court, which have been followed by this court, there are two ways by which a judgment, rendered when this one was, could be prevented from becoming dormant: First, by proper entry thereon every seven years by an officer authorized to execute and return the same and the recording of the said entry on the execution docket of the court in which the judgment was obtained, with the date of recording entered by the clerk, as provided by sections 4355, 4357, of the Civil Code of 1910; or "by a bona fide public effort on the part of the plaintiff in fi. fa. to enforce his execution in the courts of the country, at such times and periods that seven years would not elapse between such attempts, or between such an attempt and a proper entry." Hollis v. Lamb, 114 Ga. 745, 746, 40 S. E. 751, 754.

The first of these methods is based upon the express language of the statute; the second grows out of an equitable construction thereof. This equitable construction of the dormancy statute has been adhered to by the Supreme Court from the case of Wiley v. Kelsey, 3 Ga. 274, to the last pronouncement of that court upon the subject. By keeping in view these different methods, some of the apparent conflicts in the decisions of the Supreme Court can be reconciled. In the Wiley-Kelsey Case, supra, the Supreme Court held:

"If an execution is not barred under the dormant judgment act, at the time it comes into court to claim money, the statute cannot subsequently attach, pending the litigation respecting the distribution of the fund."

In Hart v. Evans, 80 Ga. 330, 5 S. E. 99, Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley said:

"Creditors are never barred by lapse of time whilst the law itself hinders them from proceeding."

And see Cox v. Montford, 66 Ga. 62 (2).

In Fulcher v. Mandell, 83 Ga. 715 (1), 10 S. E. 582, it was held:

"When judgment was obtained and the execution issuing therefrom was levied upon land, and a claim was interposed, the prosecution of this claim in the courts for over six years was such a public act on the part of the plaintiff in judgment as to prevent the statute of limitations from running pending the litigation, as to all the property of the defendant."

See, also, Rogers v. Smith, 98 Ga. 789 (2), and cases cited on page 790, 25 S. E. 753, where Mr. Chief Justice Simmons said:

"The statute is satisfied where there is any proceeding by the plaintiff entered of record which notifies the world that he claims his judgment is subsisting."

In Long v. Wight, 82 Ga. 481, the Supreme Court (page 484) 9 S. E. 535, said:

"The rule seems to be, according to the decisions rendered by this court, that any bona fide action of the plaintiff which shows that he intends to keep the judgment alive will prevent its dormancy. Smith v. Rust, 79 Ga. 519; Gholston v. O'Kelley, 81 Ga. 19. As far as appears from this record, the levy was a bona fide attempt on the part of the plaintiff in fi. fa. to collect the amount of the execution. It shows action on his part to collect his judgment, and this, as we have seen by the above citations, is sufficient to prevent dormancy of the judgment."

In Easterlin v. New Home Sewing Machine Co., 115 Ga. 305, 41 S. E. 595, Mr. Justice Little, in concluding his opinion, said:

"It clearly appears that the executions were issued upon the judgments within seven years from their date, and that these executions were placed upon the docket within seven years, and that less than seven years elapsed between the time they were so entered and the date they were placed in the hands of the officer to claim the money arising from the sale of the property of the defendant in execution. This being true, they were not dormant, and the trial judge erred in ruling that these fi. fas. could not participate in the distribution of the fund."

See, also, Nelson v. Gill, 56 Ga. 536; Stanford v. Connery, 84 Ga. 731 (1), 11 S. E. 507; and cases cited in Gholston v. O'Kelley, 81 Ga. 19, 7 S. E. 107. The first headnote in Hollis v. Lamb, supra, is as follows:

"Active and bona fide efforts on the part of a plaintiff in fi. fa. to enforce his execution by any appropriate legal proceedings are, if duly taken, sufficient to prevent the dormancy of the judgment on which it issued; and in order to have this effect it is not necessary that any entry relating to such efforts, other than those otherwise required or authorized to be made on the execution, shall be entered either on the execution itself or the execution docket of the court in which the judgment was rendered."

In discussing that case Mr. Justice Little reviewed the statutes on the subject of dormancy of judgments and a number of the decisions of the Supreme Court, and concluded his opinion as follows:

"This brings us to a consideration of the act of 1885 (Acts 1884-85, p. 95), on which section 3761 of our Civil Code [Civil Code of 1910, § 4355] is based. That act made practically but one change in the law as it then stood in relation to the dormancy of judgments, and that was that the entries made on an execution by the officer which were sufficient to prevent its dormancy should be entered upon the execution docket of the court from which it issued; and it is now declared, in that section of the Code, that when seven years have elapsed from the time of the record upon the execution docket of the last entry upon the execution, made by an officer authorized to execute and return the same, the judgment shall be dormant. If the provisions of the previous law which required proper entries to be made upon the execution every seven years in order to prevent dormancy did not, under the construction of that statute by our court, render such judgment dormant in the absence of such entries when the plaintiff in fi. fa. was making public attempts to enforce his execution within the limitation, it would be inconsistent to now rule that the mere addition of a requirement that such entries should be placed upon the execution docket has abrogated the rule of equitable construction which has invariably been given to statutes in relation to the dormancy of judgments. In harmony with the spirit of the rulings heretofore made, and under the unbroken precedent giving to these statutes an equitable construction, it must be again ruled that the dormancy of a judgment is prevented either by proper entries every seven years, duly recorded on the execution docket, or by a bona fide public effort on the part of the plaintiff in fi. fa. to enforce his execution in the courts of the country, at such times and periods that seven years will not elapse between such attempts, or between such an attempt and a proper entry; and that a true construction of section 3761 of the Code [Civil Code of 1910, § 4355] is that either proper entries on the execution duly entered on the execution docket, or bona fide attempts to enforce the same against the property of the defendant within the stated period, will be sufficient to prevent dormancy."

See, also, the opinion of Chief Judge Hill in Smith v. Zachry, 1 Ga. App. 344,<sup>1</sup> and opinion of Justice Beck in Craven v. Martin, 140 Ga. 652, 79 S. E. 568.

Section 4355 of the Civil Code of 1910, which is construed above, is the law under which this case must be decided. Under the express terms of this statute the judgment which was rendered September 14, 1907, would become dormant within seven years from that date unless the judgment was entered upon the execution docket of the court in which it was rendered, but not having been so entered, and no other entry on the execution docket having been made, under the foregoing ruling was the dormancy prevented by "any bona fide action of the plaintiff which shows that he intends to keep the judgment alive"? On September 8, 1912, the execution was levied and a claim filed. This claim was tried September 29, 1912, the execution ordered to proceed, and the property advertised for sale in June, 1915. The Supreme Court has held, as shown by its opinions hereinbefore cited, that a levy "was a bona fide attempt on the part of the plaintiff in fi. fa. to collect the execution"; that the prosecution of the claim "was such a public act on the part of the plaintiff in judgment as to prevent the statute of limitation from running pending the litigation"; and that "it would be inconsistent to now rule that the mere addition of a requirement that such entries [on executions] should be placed upon the execution docket has abrogated the rule of equitable construction which has invariably been given to statutes in relation to the dormancy of judgments"; that "creditors are never barred by the lapse of time while the law itself prevents them from proceeding"; and that it is only necessary to show effort to collect the execution and that such efforts were made "at such times and periods that seven years will not elapse between such attempts." Applying, to the judgment in this case, the "equitable construction" rule laid down by the Supreme Court, it appearing that seven years did not elapse between efforts to collect the execution, the judgment was not dormant "at the time the property was advertised for sale," and the trial judge erred in treating it as dormant.

All the other rulings complained of in the bill of exceptions were based upon a mistaken idea of the court that the execution was dormant, and, as the case is to be tried again, it is unnecessary to consider the other allegations of error; all of them being controlled by this ruling.

The Supreme Court having so long adhered to the rule of equitable construction laid down in Hollis v. Lamb, supra, we will not comply with the request of counsel for plaintiff in error and certify this case to the Supreme Court and ask that that case and "all other cases following it be reviewed and overruled."

BANK OF LA GRANGE v. RUTLAND.
(No. 12154.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 7, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances  $\Leftrightarrow$  47 — "Goods, wares, and merchandise" not taken in restricted sense in Bulk Sales Act.

The words, "goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in the Bulk Sales Act (Civ. Code 1910, § 3226 et seq.), are not to be taken in such a restricted sense as to exclude the usual and customary fixtures or accessories used in connection with the business to which they are appropriate, whenever their transfer is included in an absolute sale in bulk, out of the usual course of the business or trade, of the entire, or substantially the entire, stock. Parham v. Potts-Thompson Co., 127 Ga. 303 (7), 58 S. E. 460; Cooney v. Sweat, 133 Ga. 511, 513, 66 S. E. 257, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 758; Va.-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Bouchelle, 12 Ga. App. 661 (1), 662, 78 S. E. 51.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Goods.]

2. Fraudulent conveyances  $\Leftrightarrow$  47—Bulk Sales Act strictly construed.

The Bulk Sales Act, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed, and a bill of sale made to secure a debt is not such a transfer as comes within the purview of the act. Wright v. Cline, 107 S. E. 593; Avery v. Carter, 18 Ga. App. 527, 89 S. E. 1051. However, the provisions of the law apply to a sale of a stock of goods in bulk by a debtor to a creditor, in total or partial extinguishment of his debt secured by a bill of sale, and such a sale made in disregard of this act is fraudulent and void as against other creditors of the common debtor. Sampson v. Brandon Grocery Co., 127 Ga. 454, 56 S. E. 488, 9 Ann. Cas. 331.

3. Execution  $\Leftrightarrow$  37—Judgment creditor must redeem property conveyed as security.

In order for a creditor to levy an execution upon property covered by a valid bill of sale made to secure a debt, the creditors must first redeem the property by paying off in full the security debt, and a levy made without a compliance with such condition precedent is void. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 6038, 3306; Smith v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 145 Ga. 741 (2), 743, 89 S. E. 762; Shumate v. McLendon, 120 Ga. 396 (4, 5, 6), 48 S. E. 10; Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Williams, 146 Ga. 482, 91 S. E. 543.

4. Attachment  $\Leftrightarrow$  53—Judgment creditor must discharge amount due on valid security bill of sale.

Thus, where the owner of a stock of goods, without complying with the provisions of the Bulk Sales Act, has sought to make an absolute transfer of the goods to the holder of a security bill of sale and for a consideration consisting in part of the extinguishment of the security bill of sale, but where the security bill of sale remains uncanceled of record, another creditor of the seller is not permitted to levy upon the goods in the hands of the transferee, without first discharging the amount due on the valid security bill of sale. Whatever might be the rights of the parties to the attempted transfer in treating it as binding between themselves (see McDowell v. McMurria, 107 Ga. 812, 816, 33 S. E. 709, 73 Am. St. Rep. 155, and note to the case of Escalle v. Mark, 5 A. L. R. 1517), an attachment creditor, as the moving party, having treated the sale as void as to himself, cannot at the same time be heard to insist upon its validity as between the parties thereto. Under the statute, the rights of such a creditor are to be taken precisely as if the attempted transfer had not been made. By virtue of the act he is simply restored to what rights he would otherwise have lost. It is not intended to improve his condition by giving him superior rights. Such an attempted sale is merely a legal fraud (Jaques & Tinsley Co. v. Carstarphen Co., 131 Ga. 1, 16, 62 S. E. 82), and it is not the purpose of the statute to impose punitive forfeitures of pre-existing valid liens in favor of other creditors (see Flash v. Wilkerson [C. C.] 20 Fed. 257).

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; J. R. Terrell, Judge.

J. T. Rutland sued out an attachment alleging fraudulent sale to the Bank of La Grange. The latter filed a claim. From judgment for plaintiff for part of the amount sued for, the claimant brings error. Reversed.

Rutland sued out a fraudulent debtor's attachment, alleging that the debtor had transferred his stock and fixtures to the Bank of La Grange without first giving the notice to creditors required by the Bulk Sales Act. After the levy, the transferee filed a claim. From the evidence in the claim case it appeared that the stock and fixtures transferred consisted of meat market fixtures and some meat, which constituted "the entire meat market, including all fixtures and stock on hand." It was admitted by the claimant that, while the transfer was made in an attempted settlement and payment of a previous security bill of sale, only $225 was due on this bill of sale at the time of the transfer. On the trial and in argument to this court the transferee did not seek to defend the legality of the transfer, but based its claim upon a right of title under its original bill of sale, executed by the debtor to secure a debt and recorded more than a year before the transfer. It appears that this bill of sale was not canceled of record. The claimant contended that the levy of the attachment was invalid, because the attaching creditor did not before the levy redeem the property by a payment in full of the debt secured by the bill of sale. The jury found the property subject to the levy "excepting $225 balance covered by the bill of sale," and the court rendered judgment as follows:

"That the property levied upon by the attachment is subject to the levy made in this case, except that the Bank of La Grange shall receive and be paid from the sale of said property when sold the sum of $225."

The claimant moved for a new trial upon the general grounds, the motion was overruled, and the movant excepted. The attaching creditor filed no motion for new trial or cross-bill of exceptions as to that part of the verdict and judgment which recognized the validity and priority of the original security bill of sale.

It is not necessary to elaborate the rulings stated in the headnotes.

Appeal and error §1064(1)—Trial §237 (5)—Court should have charged that jury might consider number of witnesses, and omission was harmful.

It is well settled that, when a judge undertakes to charge the law upon any subject, he must charge all of it upon that subject that is material and applicable to the case. Rouse v. State, 2 Ga. App. 184, 58 S. E. 416; Harper v. State, 17 Ga. App. 561 (2), 87 S. E. 808. Upon the controlling issue in this case the plaintiff introduced a single witness and the defendant several witnesses. Therefore, when a part of section 5732 of the Civil Code (1910) was given in charge to the jury it was harmful error against the defendant to omit that part of the section which provides that "the jury may also consider the number of witnesses, though the preponderance is not necessarily with the greater number."

1. Sales  $\S$ 23(4)—Offer must be accepted unconditionally.

An answer to an offer will not amount to an acceptance, so as to result in a binding contract, unless it be unconditional and identical with the terms of the offer. If there be a variance between the offer and the answer, there is no acceptance, but a counter offer, which, to result in a contract, must be accepted by the original proposer.

2. Sales  $\S$ 23(4)—Offer must be accepted unconditionally.

It being shown by undisputed evidence that the defendant made a proposal with a request for acceptance by telegram, and the plaintiff replied by telegram, but the reply was not an unqualified acceptance of the proposal, but contained substantially a new proposal as to the time when the goods ordered were to be delivered, this amounted in law to a rejection of the defendant's proposal, and the defendant, at its option, had the right so to construe it. A nonsuit was therefore properly awarded.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Sales  $\S$ 23(4)—Change of time of delivery amounted to rejection of order.

Where order was given for goods, part of which were to be delivered at a certain time in the future, but, by reason of negligence in reading telegram of salesman, seller understood that shipment was to be immediate, and wired an acceptance of the offer for immediate delivery, there was no binding contract of sale; there being a material variance between the order and the acceptance.

4. Sales  $\S$ 23(1)—Offer must be renewed after rejection.

An offer to purchase, when once rejected, loses its legal force, and cannot be accepted thereafter so as to create a binding agreement, unless it is renewed after the rejection by the original offerer.

5. Sales  $\S$ 23(4) — Attempted acceptance, seeking to modify term, constitutes rejection of offer.

An attempted acceptance of an offer to purchase, which seeks to modify one or more terms of the offer, constitutes a rejection of the offer, and the original offer cannot be accepted thereafter unless renewed.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. L. Crawley, Judge.

Action by the Winder Manufacturing Company against the A. S. Pendleton Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On April 13, 1920, the defendant placed with the plaintiff two orders for goods, upon terms and conditions expressed in the orders. These orders were wired to the plaintiff by its salesman, with instructions to wire acceptance at once. The orders were that a stated portion of the goods should be shipped to the defendant by the plaintiff on September 1, 1920. The plaintiff's wired acceptance misinterpreted the time of shipment to be immediate. This misinterpretation was caused by no fault or fraud on the part of the defendant, but apparently by a negligent reading of the telegram of the plaintiff's own agent, conveying to it the order of the defendant. This misinterpretation induced the defendant to believe that its orders as to the goods to be shipped the 1st of September were rejected by the plaintiff, who attempted a counter proposition in the acceptance of the orders. This counter proposition was not accepted by the defendant. On the contrary, in a letter written to the plaintiff, the defendant expressed a willingness to take the goods if shipped immediately, and asked for some definite statement as to whether or not they would be shipped promptly, and stated that in view of the misinterpretation of their original orders they had made other arrangements for fall goods. In reply the plaintiff wrote a letter, attempting to accept the original offer. There was no reply to this letter. Nevertheless, the plaintiff, on or about September 1, shipped to the defendant the goods ordered to be shipped on that date. They were rejected, and the plaintiff, relying upon the remedy provided in the last part of section 4131 of the Civil Code of 1910, paid the freight and demurrage charges on the goods, stored them in the city of Valdosta for the use of the defendant, and brought this suit for the entire purchase price. The defendant, by its answer, admitted that goods of the grade and quantity designated by its orders were shipped at the time specified therein, but contended that it was not liable, on the ground that its orders had not been accepted by the plaintiff according to their terms and conditions, but that the plaintiff's acceptance by wire of the defendant's original orders was a material change of the terms of the orders in reference to the time when the goods ordered were to be shipped, and this misinterpretation was a rejection of the original order, and the defendant had so construed it and ordered the goods from elsewhere. The transactions were by letters and telegrams, and after their introduction a motion to nonsuit was sustained.

G. A. Johns, of Winder, and Whitaker & Dukes, of Valdosta, for plaintiff in error.

Walker, Small & Little, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-5] The evidence was not in conflict, and under its only reasonable construction a nonsuit was proper. When the plaintiff wired its acceptance of the offer which had been telegraphed to it by its salesman, in which telegram of acceptance it changed the time for delivery of the goods to immediate delivery, instead of the 1st of September following this was such a material variance between the order and the acceptance as amounted in law to a rejection of the order and a counter offer on the part of the plaintiff as to the time of delivery. The defendant had the right so to regard it, and any attempt to revive this order by the plaintiff could not have been successful without the defendant's consent, which was never given. On the contrary, the defendant's construction of the plaintiff's telegram as being a rejection of its original order was distinctly stated by the defendant in its letter to the plaintiff on the subject. The entire correspondence by letters and telegrams, introduced in evidence, shows that there was no contract between the parties.

"An attempted acceptance which seeks to modify one or more terms of the offer is of no legal effect as an acceptance. It is really a rejection of the offer, and a counter proposition in lieu of the original offer, and must be accepted by the party making the original offer, in order to constitute an agreement." 1 Page on Contracts (1st Ed.) 75, § 46.

"An offer, when once rejected, loses its legal force, and cannot be accepted thereafter so as to create a binding agreement, unless it is renewed after the rejection by the original offerer. No revocation of the offer is therefore necessary to prevent its subsequent acceptance after it has once been rejected." Id. 66, § 37.

"A proposal to accept, or an acceptance, upon terms varying from those offered, is a rejection of the offer, and puts an end to the negotiation, unless the party who made the original offer renews it, or assent to the modification suggested." Minneapolis & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Columbus Rolling Mill Co., 119 U. S. 149, 151, 7 Sup. Ct. 168, 169, 30 L. Ed. pp. 376-377.

Here the facts show a proposition by the defendant, and an acceptance upon terms varying materially from this offer. This amounted to a rejection of the offer; and the negotiation was at an end, because the original party, who made the offer, made no attempt or effort to renew it, and did not assent to any modification suggested nor any attempt to renew the acceptance of the offer made to it by the plaintiff. (Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2

1. Bailment §26—Tender for services in treatment of cow held unnecessary in view of defense.

A cow, having received certain injuries, was delivered by the owner to another, who, withholding possession on demand from the original owner, was sued in trover. On the trial the evidence of the plaintiff and the defendant was in conflict as to what constituted the agreement under which the cow was delivered and received. The plaintiff's contention was that the defendant was to treat the wounds of the cow and, if a recovery should be effected, was to receive proper compensation therefor. The defendant's contention was to the effect that he bought the cow with the understanding that he was to pay $10 therefor, but only on condition that his treatment of the wounds was successful, and that if the cow died from the wounds he was to bury her at his expense. The evidence, when taken all together, shows that, upon plaintiff's calling for the cow, the defendant refused to deliver her up, but that he offered to pay plaintiff the $10. It failed to show that the plaintiff ever offered to pay the compensation for the treatment. No motion for nonsuit was made, but at the conclusion of defendant's evidence the trial judge directed a verdict in defendant's favor. Held:

While it would be a good defense to an action in trover that the defendant, holding the property as a bailee for hire, has not been paid or tendered the amount due him (Jeems v. Lewis, 13 Ga. App. 456, 79 S. E. 235), yet where such is not the defense, but where the defendant, as the ground of his refusal to deliver the property on demand and as the ground of his defense to the action, sets up and relies solely upon ownership under a contract of purchase alleged to have been made with the plaintiff, the necessity of such a previous tender is dispensed with, and the disputed issue as to whether the property was delivered under a sale or under a bailment for hire should have been left to the determination of the jury.

2. Trover and conversion §9(6) — Demand and refusal unnecessary in view of claim of adverse title.

Not only is there undisputed evidence of a demand and refusal, but the defendant, by setting up in his pleading title adverse to the plaintiff and admitting such refusal, dispenses with such evidence of a conversion. Moore v. Ramsey, 144 Ga. 118 (1), 86 S. E. 219.

3. Pleading §36(3)—Defendant estopped by pleadings to claim absence of evidence of plaintiff's title at time of delivery.

The evidence of plaintiff's title, and right of possession and control, at the time of the delivery to the defendant, is likewise clear; and this the defendant cannot be heard to dispute, since the defense is based upon title in the defendant acquired from the plaintiff at that time.

Carriers §27(6)—Verdict for $150 for carrying passenger beyond destination not excessive.

The plaintiff, a woman, bought a ticket from the defendant for passage from Ball Ground to Elizabeth, Ga., and, after getting on board the train, told the conductor that the road was strange to her, and that she wanted him to see that she got off when she arrived at her destination. The station was not called when the train reached Elizabeth, nor was the plaintiff notified in any way, and she did not know that she had arrived at her destination until after the train had passed through the station. When she discovered this fact she requested the conductor to stop the train and let her get off. He refused to do this, and, upon his insistence, she paid the additional fare to Marietta, Ga., where she left the train and secured conveyance back to Elizabeth on a truck. The court charged the jury that if the plaintiff was entitled to recover, she would be entitled to recover nominal damages only. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for $150, and the sole issue before this court is whether this amount was excessive. We do not think so. Southern R. Co. v. Johnson, 8 Ga. App. 654, 70 S. E. 69, citing Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Glenn, 8 Ga. App. 168, 68 S. E. 881.

1. Bail §96—Fines §20—Distribution of money arising from fines or forfeited recognizances.

2. Fines §20—Priority of officers in distribution of funds.

In the distribution of funds arising from fines and forfeitures in criminal cases, the approved cost bills of the immediate predecessor in office of an incumbent are not entitled to priority over those of former officers, unless such immediate predecessor is the officer bringing the funds into court.

3. Fines §20—Surplus in funds arising from fines and forfeitures does not belong to county.

After the costs of the officers who bring funds into court have been paid, the surplus does not belong to the county to the exclusion of former officers who have itemized bills of costs approved by the court, even though such officers may not be the immediate predecessors of the incumbents.

4. Fines §20—Insolvent cost for subpoenas for witnesses paid out of fines and forfeitures fund.

Where a clerk of the superior court has issued subpoenas for witnesses to appear before the grand jury, and has properly presented his account therefor, and the account has been allowed by the judge, as provided in section 1113 of the Penal Code of 1910, this insolvent cost will be paid out of the fines and forfeitures fund as other insolvent costs are paid, and as is provided by section 1114 of the Penal Code of 1910.

Error from Superior Court, Dade County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Petition by L. S. Lyemance, clerk of the superior court, and others for distribution of a balance left in the fines and forfeitures fund of Dade County. From the judgment, the county brings error. Affirmed.

After paying all insolvent costs due officers of court for the year 1920, there was left a balance of $1,406.60 in the fines and forfeitures fund of Dade county. A petition was brought for the distribution of this sum, the parties interested therein being L. S. Lyemance, clerk of the superior court; W. H. Cross, former sheriff; W. N. Tatum, former sheriff; S. J. Hale, former clerk; Lonnie Smith, executor of estate of Martin G. Smith, deceased, former clerk. The case was submitted to the trial judge upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"It is admitted that L. S. Lyemance, clerk of the superior court of Dade county, has in his hands the sum of $1,406.60, belonging to the fine and forfeiture fund of said county, having accrued in the year 1920. It is further admitted that the minutes of the court show that Joe M. Lang, solicitor general, for the use of Dade county, has still unpaid as insolvent costs, for the term 1917 to 1920, inclusive, the sum of $122.48; that L. S. Lyemance, clerk for the same term, has due him the sum of $102.70, and that W. H. Cross, sheriff for same term, has due him $111.09. It is further admitted that L. S. Lyemance has issued subpoenas for witness to come before the grand jury during the term 1917-1920 to the number of 513, and that there are four no bills returned by the grand jury for which said Lyemance now claims judgment. It is further admitted that L. S. Lyemance, as for former clerk, has due him for the term 1915-1916, inclusive, the sum of $29.55 for grand jury subpoenas which has not been included in any judgment for insolvent costs, for which sum he is now claiming a judgment. It is further admitted that L. S. Lyemance, former clerk, has due him, according to the minutes of the court, as insolvent costs for the term 1915-1916, the sum of $215.16, for which judgment has been taken; that W. N. Tatum, former sheriff, has due him for the term 1915-1916, according to the minutes of the court as insolvent costs, the sum of $302.04, for which judgment has been taken; that Joe M. Lang, former solicitor general (now for the use of Dade county), has due him for the term 1915-1916, as shown by the minutes of the court, as insolvent costs, the sum of $836.85, for which judgment has been taken; that Lonnie Smith, as executor of M. G. Smith, deceased former clerk of superior court, has due him for insolvent costs for term 1913-1914, as shown by the minutes of the court, $142.95, for which judgment has been taken; that W. N. Tatum, former sheriff, has due him for the term 1913-1914, as insolvent costs, as shown by the minutes of the court, the sum of $24.37, for which judgment has been taken. That the former solicitor general, for the use of Dade county, for the term 1913-1914, has due as insolvent costs as shown by the minutes of the court the sum of $268.50, for which judgment has been taken; that S. J. Hale, former clerk, has due him for the terms covering 1903 to 1913, inclusive, for which judgment has been taken in 1912, as shown by the minutes of the court, as insolvent costs, the sum of $724.89; that W. N. Tatum, former sheriff, has due him for terms 1911-1912, as insolvent costs, for which judgment has been taken, as shown by the minutes of the court, the sum of $215.08; that the solicitor general for the use of Dade county has due him for terms covering 1903 to 1912, inclusive, for which judgment has been taken in 1912, as shown by the minutes of the court, as insolvent costs, the sum of $720.18. It is agreed that there has been no lack of diligence of either or any of the above claimants, and that nothing has been left undone towards the collection of said judgments, or keeping them alive, that could have been done. It is further agreed by all parties that all technical pleadings are waived; and that the court shall pass upon the legal priorities of above claims and award the funds to the claimants legally entitled to the same, irrespective to any technicalities or lack of proper pleadings."

The judgment of the court decreed that the fund in question be disbursed and paid among the claimants as follows:

"L. S. Lyemance, clerk, W. H. Cross, sheriff, and Joe M. Lang, solicitor general, for the use of Dade county, in full for all costs accruing during the term 1917 to 1920, inclusive, as set out in the agreed statement of facts, including the amount claimed by L. S. Lyemance, clerk, for grand jury subpoenas issued during that period, which amount is declared a charge against the fine and forfeiture fund and payable therefrom, and judgment for which is hereby given as prayed. * * * The balance of said fund to be divided between the former officers, the claimants herein, in proportion to the amounts of their claims (allowing to the said L. S. Lyemance, former clerk, the amount due for grand jury subpoenas during the term 1915-1916, as a charge against the fine and forfeiture fund, to be added to his other insolvent costs and share pro rata) so that the balance of said fund shall be disbursed as follows," etc.

This judgment was excepted to on the ground that it was contrary to law.

Joe M. Lang, Sol. Gen., of Calhoun, for plaintiff in error.

McClure, Hale & McClure, of Trenton, for defendants in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The first contention of the plaintiff in error is that the judgment of the lower court is contrary to law because "no former clerk or sheriff, not the immediate predecessor of present incumbents, is entitled to share in the distribution of said fund at all." This contention is without any semblance of merit, as section 1114 of the Penal Code of 1910 completely refutes it. That section is as follows:

[2] 2. The next contention of the plaintiff in error is that the judgment is contrary to law because "no former clerk or sheriff, not the immediate predecessor of present incumbents, is entitled to share in the distribution of said fund until the amount due each of immediate predecessors of present incumbents is paid in full." This contention is also without substantial merit. The law does not entitle the immediate predecessors of present incumbents to priority over former officers, unless such predecessor assisted in bringing the fund into court. In the case of Freeman v. Hardeman, 67 Ga. 559, 560, in which a clerk of the court who was his own predecessor in office claimed a priority in the fund in question over an older order of a former solicitor general, the court, speaking through Justice Crawford, said:

"The claim of the clerk for his insolvent costs for previous years, not within his present term of office, was likewise rejected, and preference given to the administratrix of Montfort upon his oldest order. To determine whether that ruling was error, it is only necessary to inquire whether a former clerk of the court could be considered as one of those officers bringing the money into court. That it happened in this case that the individual person was the former clerk does not change the rule of law specifying what officers shall be entitled; its reference is to the officer not the man."

[3] 3. The next contention of the plaintiff in error is that the judgment is contrary to law because—

"when officers bringing the fund into court are fully paid [the present incumbents], the balance of the money belongs to Dade county, and no former officer except the immediate predecessor of present incumbents is entitled to the same, or any part thereof, as against Dade county."

This contention is untenable, in view of the statute law of this state. Section 1114 of the Penal Code of 1910 specifically provides that money arising from fines and forfeiture shall be first applied to the extinguishment of insolvent costs of the officers bringing it into court, and "then to the orders of former officers in proportion to their claims." Section 1116 provides that—

"The officers of the several courts, including the prosecuting officers, shall pay into the county treasury of the county where said court is held all moneys arising from fines and forfeitures by them collected, and, on failure to do so, shall be subject to rule and attachment, as in case of defaulting sheriffs. But no such officer shall be required to pay into the treasury, as aforesaid, any such moneys, until all the legal claims on such funds held and owned by said officer bringing the money into court, and the costs due the justices and constables in the particular case by which the funds for distribution were brought into court, shall have been allowed and paid."

Section 1118 provides that—

"The moneys, so paid in, shall be kept separate and distinct from the county funds arising from other sources, and distinct and separate accounts of said funds shall also be kept as to what court the same was received from, by the county treasurer, and the same shall be paid only for insolvent costs, and in cases where defendants have been acquitted in the manner hereinafter directed."

And section 1119 provides that—

"Any officer having a claim against said fund for insolvent costs, or in cases where defendant has been acquitted, if the same accrued in the superior court (or a magistrate's court prior to indictment), shall present to the judge of the superior court an itemized bill of costs claimed; and if the same shall be approved by him, he shall order the same entered on the minutes of the court, and the same shall be a warrant on the county treasurer, to be paid by him out of any fines and forfeitures in the treasury received from the superior court."

It is clear even from a casual reading of the above sections that after the costs of the officers bringing funds into court have been paid out of money arising from fines and forfeitures, the surplus does not belong entirely to the county to the exclusion of former officers who have itemized bills of cost approved by the judge, although such officers may not be the immediate predecessors of present incumbents. See Bartlett v. Brunson, 115 Ga. 459, 41 S. E. 601, in which it was held:

"The law directing how the solicitor general shall distribute the moneys he collects and where the surplus shall be paid, it follows that where the solicitor general has a surplus in his hands he cannot be ruled by a former solicitor, not his immediate predecessor, and required to pay the surplus to the latter. Such surplus must be paid to the county treasurer, and the remedy of the former solicitor, if he has orders on the insolvent fund, is to collect his claims out of the county treasurer when the latter has funds available for this purpose." (Italics ours.)

See, also, in this connection, Johnson v. Lastinger, 148 Ga. 856, 98 S. E. 78.

[4] 4. The next contention of the plaintiff in error is that the judgment is contrary to law because the "issuing of subpoenas for witnesses before the grand jury by the clerk is not a proper charge against the fine and forfeiture fund." This contention is likewise without merit. Section 1133 of the Penal Code of 1910, in setting forth in the fee bill the fees or costs to be paid the clerk for specified services, and fixing the amount to be paid for such service, provides that—

"The clerks of the superior courts shall be entitled to charge and collect the following fees for official duties performed by them, to wit:
* * * For subpoenas, each 15 cents."

Obviously, the language of this section is broad enough to include all subpoenas issued by the clerk, and it is therefore immaterial whether they be grand jury or petit jury subpoenas. In the case of Clark v. Clark, 137 Ga. 189 (2), 73 S. E. 15, it was held that—

"Insolvent criminal costs are costs in criminal cases which the statute provides shall be due sheriffs as fees for services rendered in criminal cases and which are expressly and specifically provided for as to the services rendered, and the amount to be paid therefor, and which are insolvent for the reason that they cannot be collected either on account of the insolvency of the party liable therefor, or otherwise."

The issuing of subpoenas, whether grand jury or petit jury subpoenas, is a service for which provision has been made in the fee bill for clerks, and consequently is properly chargeable as insolvent costs.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment of the lower court in distributing the funds in question, and in holding that the issuance of grand jury subpoenas was a proper charge against the fines and forfeitures fund, was not contrary to law for any reason assigned.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Bankruptcy  $\S$  433(7) — Failure to push plea for stay of proceedings no forfeiture of right to set up final discharge in bankruptcy.

Where the defendant in a suit on a promissory note made a defense by his original plea, and subsequently, by an amendment, set up bankruptcy proceedings pending against him in the federal court, and asked for a stay of the proceeding, under the provisions of Bankruptcy Act,  $\S$  11 (U. S. Comp. St.  $\S$  9595), but on the trial of the case relied solely upon his defense as made by his original plea, and did not bring to the attention of the court the amendment by which he asked for a stay of the proceeding, nor invoke any action of the trial court thereon, but contested only the right to a judgment against him on the merits of the case, he did not thereby forfeit his right to set up his final discharge in bankruptcy, if, after the judgment against him in the trial court, he obtained such final discharge, and he could produce that discharge and set it up by an affidavit of illegality to the levy of the execution based upon the judgment rendered against him.

2. Judgment  $\S$  719 — No issue of bankruptcy before court where defendant abandoned plea.

In an action on a note, where defendant made defense on the merits, and subsequently by amendment set up bankruptcy proceedings pending, and asked for stay of proceedings, but on the trial did not bring the amendment to the attention of the court and relied solely on his defense on the merits, there was no issue before the trial court on the question of bankruptcy, under the rule that a judgment is conclusive as to all matters put in issue, under Civ. Code 1910,  $\S$  4336.

3. Bankruptcy  $\S$  391(3) — Right to stay of proceedings in another court may be waived.

The provision of the Bankruptcy Law (U. S. Comp. St.  $\S$  9595) allowing a defendant to stay the proceedings against him pending the bankruptcy proceedings is primarily for the benefit of the bankrupt, that he may avoid being harassed in both courts at the same time with regard to the same debt, and is therefore a right which he may waive.

4. Bankruptcy  $\S$  421(1) — No levy of execution on property acquired after discharge.

An execution in personam, founded on a debt provable in bankruptcy, where the plaintiff in fi. fa. had notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy, cannot be enforced against property of bankrupt acquired subsequently to his discharge.

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by W. R. Craig against G. W. Cameron. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Shattuck & Shattuck, of La Fayette, for plaintiff in error.

Rosser & Shaw, of La Fayette, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This case arose on the hearing of an affidavit of illegality interposed to the levy of an execution upon a stock of goods, and the facts, about which there was no dispute, are as follows:

On July 30, 1918, a suit was filed in Walker superior court upon a promissory note, and on August 5, 1918, the defendant filed an answer thereto, in which he set up that he was not indebted to the plaintiff as alleged, and claimed certain items as a set-off against the note. On November 5, 1918, the defendant was duly adjudged a voluntary bankrupt by the District Court of the United States sitting in bankruptcy, of which the plaintiff had notice, but the plaintiff did not prove his claim in the bankruptcy court. Subsequently the defendant by an amendment to his plea, set up the bankruptcy proceedings and asked a stay of the proceeding in the state court until his discharge. This amendment, for some reason not apparent, was not allowed by the court, though it was filed with the original answer, nor so far as appears, was the amendment ever brought to the attention of the trial court. On March 6, 1919, the case in the state court was decided against the defendant, and a judgment for the full amount of the suit was rendered. On September 6, 1919, the defendant obtained his discharge in bankruptcy. On December 31, 1919, an execution, based upon the verdict and judgment mentioned was levied upon a stock of goods, which it was admitted had been acquired by the bankrupt after his discharge, and to this levy the defendant interposed the affidavit of illegality, in which was set up his discharge in bankruptcy and the allegation was made that on account of such discharge the execution was proceeding illegally, and further that the property levied upon was not subject to levy and sale, because the defendant had acquired the property subsequent to the bankruptcy proceedings and his discharge. The trial judge, without the intervention of a jury, heard the case and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, sustaining the affidavit of illegality.

[1,2] The plaintiff in error insists that as the defendant filed an amendment to his plea in the trial court, in which he set up the bankruptcy proceedings and asked for a stay of the suit, he cannot again be heard to set up his bankruptcy and discharge in an illegality proceeding; in other words, that he is bound by the verdict and judgment against him, rendered in the trial court after he had appeared and filed the amendment, setting up the bankruptcy proceedings and asking of the court a stay of the proceeding against him. This amendment, while apparently filed, was not considered or decided by the court, and was not brought to the attention of the trial court by any proof of the record from the bankruptcy court showing the existence of such bankruptcy proceedings. There was therefore no issue before the trial court on the question of the defendant's bankruptcy or the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings, and the only judgment rendered against the defendant in favor of the plaintiff was a judgment for the amount due on the note upon which the suit was brought. Of course it is fundamental that—

"A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive between the same parties and their privies as to all matters put in issue, or which under the rules of law might have been put in issue in the cause wherein the judgment was rendered." Civil Code 1910, § 4336.

It is well settled that—

"If the defendant in a suit in a state court desires a stay of the proceedings therein, because of his having been adjudicated a bankrupt, until the application for his discharge can be heard and decided by the bankruptcy court, or if he desires to set up his discharge as a defense to such suit, he must plead the adjudication or the discharge," and "after judgment has been rendered in the state court he cannot attack the validity of the judgment therein and move the court to set aside the judgment or to treat it as a 'nullity,' either because of the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings or because of his discharge in bankruptcy from the debt on which the judgment is based. Bankruptcy proceedings must be pleaded and proved, if relied upon. Courts other than a bankruptcy court will not take judicial cognizance of such proceedings." McDougald v. Chattanooga Medicine Co., 10 Ga. App. 653, 73 S. E. 1089.

In the present case, however, it is undisputed that, while an amendment to the plea in the suit in the trial court was filed by the defendant, he failed to rely upon this amendment or to ask for an adjudication of the question there made. In other words, it is apparent that he abandoned this amendment, which, we think, he had a right to do.

[3] The provision of Bankruptcy Act, § 11 (U. S. Comp. St. § 9595), allowing the defendant to stay the proceedings against him pending the bankruptcy proceedings, is primarily for the benefit of the bankrupt, that he may avoid being harassed in both courts at the same time with regard to the same debt. It is therefore a right which he may waive. It is said by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Boynnton v. Ball, 121 U. S. 457, 7 Sup. Ct. 981, 30 L. Ed. 985, that—

"He may be willing that the suit shall proceed in the state court for many reasons: First, because he is not sure that he will ever obtain his discharge from the court in bankruptcy, in which case it would do him no good to delay the proceedings at his expense in the state court; in the second place, he may have a defense in the state court which he is quite willing to rely upon there, and to have the issue tried [as he apparently did in the present case]; in the third place, he may be very willing to have the amount in dispute liquidated in that proceeding, in which case it becomes a debt to be paid pro rata with his other debts by the assignee in bankruptcy."

But says the Supreme Court, in the same case:

"If for any of these reasons, or for others, he permits the case to proceed to judgment in the state court, by failing to procure a stay of proceedings under the provisions of this section of the bankrupt law, or the assignee in bankruptcy does not intervene as he may do, * * * he does not thereby forfeit his right to plead his final discharge in bankruptcy, if he shall obtain it, at any appropriate stage of the proceedings against him in the state court. And if * * * his final discharge is not obtained until after judgment has been rendered against him in the state court, he may produce that discharge to the state court and obtain the stay of execution."

This is exactly what the defendant in this case asked for in the court below, and, according to this ruling, the trial court was correct in sustaining his affidavit of illegality. Strickland v. Brown, 19 Ga. App. 73, 90 S. E. 1039.

[4] Even if this were not true, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the trial court should be sustained on another ground. The facts which were admitted to be true showed that the property levied upon was acquired by the defendant in error after his discharge in bankruptcy. In the case of Peterson v. Calhoun, 137 Ga. 799, 74 S. E. 519, it is held that an execution in personam, founded on a debt provable in bankruptcy, where the plaintiff in fi. fa. had notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy, cannot be enforced against property of a bankrupt acquired subsequently to his discharge, and an affidavit of illegality setting up this defense should not have been stricken. For these reasons we conclude that the judgment should be affirmed.

1. New trial  $\S$  39—Defining preponderance as being the greater weight of evidence not ground for new trial.

The judge, in his charge defined a preponderance of evidence as being "the greater weight of the evidence." Error is assigned on this portion of the charge on the ground that by preponderance of evidence is meant that superior weight of evidence. The trial court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial upon this ground. Shingler v. Bailey, 135 Ga. 666 (3), 70 S. E. 563.

2. Assignments of error without merit.

Neither is there any merit in the other assignments of error. The evidence was in conflict but there was evidence to sustain the verdict. The charge of the court was not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County;

Action by Hilliard McAfee against George Gibson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This was a suit against the owner and driver of an automobile truck for damages caused the plaintiff by the homicide of his wife. The defendant had been employed to carry the plaintiff and his deceased wife and others on the truck, owned and operated by the defendant, from Marietta to Canton, Ga. On the trip the truck was overturned, and the plaintiff's wife was caught under portions of the overturned truck and severely injured, and her death resulted from the injuries so received. The evidence as to what caused the truck to overturn was in conflict; the evidence for the plaintiff showing that it was caused by the negligence of the defendant, and the evidence for the defendant showing that the defendant was without negligence, and that the overturning of the truck was an unavoidable accident due to an unseen defect in the road. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, and a motion for a new trial made, and the case is before this court on exceptions to the judgment of the lower court refusing the grant of a new trial.

1. Sales  $\S$ 89—Modification of order takes effect from date of sending letter agreeing thereto.

A modification of an order given for goods purchased, growing out of a request from the buyer, takes effect from the date of sending the letter agreeing to such modification, and the buyer is liable for shipments of goods made prior to that date, unless the correspondence was such as to indicate that it was the purpose to rescind the entire contract, including the part which had been executed.

2. Sales  $\S$ 92—Agreement to cancel took effect only from date of mailing of letter agreeing to request.

Where order for candy was made by letter dated September 26th, order to be duplicated October 15th, November 1st, November 15th, and first shipment was made December 4th, and on November 25th purchasers wrote to discontinue shipments until further advised, but such letter did not reach seller until December 7th, and on that date seller replied that they had the letter "requesting cancellation and that it had been done," there was no cancellation of the entire order, and purchasers were liable for the price on the shipment already made; there being no evidence to show that purchasers objected to the "cancellation."

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; Malcolm D. Jones, Judge.

Suit by the Emerick Candy Company against C. E. Newton & Bro. and others. Judgment for plaintiff in the municipal court, and defendants brought certiorari. New trial ordered, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Suit was brought by the Emerick Candy Company against Newton & Bro. in the municipal court of Macon for a shipment of candy. When the case came on for hearing, the defendants assumed the burden of proof and introduced the following evidence:

An order from the defendants to the plaintiff in the form of a letter, dated September 26, 1918, as follows:

"Please ship as soon as possible the following: 200 bxs. fruit and nut loaf, 200 bxs. Coco Cr. bars, 200 bxs. crisp bit, 200 bxs. Nougat bars. Duplicate Oct. 15th, Nov. 1st, Nov. 15th."

The first shipment made on this order was under date of December 4, 1918. On November 25, 1918, Newton & Bro. wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

"Kindly discontinue shipments of 6-cent goods against the orders you have on file for us until further advised."

This letter did not reach the plaintiff until December 7, three days after the first shipment had been made. On that date the plaintiff wrote Newton & Bro. as follows:

"We have your letter of the 25th ult., requesting cancellation of your orders, which has been done."

Afterwards the defendants wrote to the candy company that the shipment had been received by them, and that they would be unable to handle the shipment, and would hold the same subject to the order of the candy company. The suit was entered for this shipment, and, after hearing the evidence, the judge of the municipal court of Macon directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. The defendants carried the case to the superior court by certiorari, and the judge of that court sustained the certiorari and remanded the case for a new trial, and the case came to this court on exceptions to this judgment.

Robt. G. Plunkett, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Strozler & Moore, of Macon, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] The contention of the defendant in error is that the contract is an entire contract, and that there has been a rescission of it, and that therefore the plaintiff in the original suit was not entitled to a judgment for any amount. The evidence introduced, as shown by the record, is very meager, and leaves wide room for inferences. The order for the goods given seems to have been undoubtedly accepted, and apparently there must have been an agreement as to price, as there seems to have been an understanding as to what was meant by "6-cent goods." Was there a rescission of the contract? Newton & Bro. requested the candy company that they discontinue shipments against the orders "until further advised." The candy company replied that they had the letter "requesting cancellation," and that it had been done. Newton & Bro. had never requested "cancellation." They had requested a discontinuance of the shipments until further advised. This letter was not received by the candy company until three days after the candy company had made the shipment for which the suit was brought.

In our opinion this did not amount to a rescission of the contract. The "cancellation" dated only from the date on which it was agreed to. Under the provisions of the Code, acceptance of a proposition by letter is from the time the written acceptance is sent. Civil Code 1910, § 4231. There is no evidence in the record to show that Newton & Bro. objected to the "cancellation" of the order. As the shipment sued for had been sent by the candy company prior to the date of this "cancellation," and as the shipment was duly received by Newton & Bro., we are of the opinion that it was obligatory upon them to pay for the goods, and that the judge of the superior court erred in sustaining the certiorari and remanding the case to the municipal court for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

NICHOLS v. WARD et al. (No. 12167.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Oct. 24, 1921.)

1. Chattel mortgages ⇨251—Mortgagor foreclosing before maturity need show only design or intent to improperly dispose of property.

Where a chattel mortgage is foreclosed and levied before its maturity, under sections 3287 and 5055 of the Civil Code of 1910, upon the grounds that the mortgagor is actually disposing or attempting to dispose of the mortgaged property so as to lessen the security, and that he is about to remove from the county of his residence, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show that the defendant was attempting to dispose of the property, or was about to remove from the county, on the very day upon which the affidavit to obtain the foreclosure was made. It is sufficient to show the existence of such a present design or intention, and the defendant's purpose to carry it into execution, at or about the time of the foreclosure. Perryman v. Pope, 102 Ga. 502 (4), 505, 81 S. E. 37; Stix v. Pump, 36 Ga. 526 (2), 531.

2. Evidence ⇨151(8)—Intent of mortgagor to dispose of property so as to lessen security before maturity may be proved by his testimony.

Where, as in such a case, design or intent is relevant to an issue, it may be proved by the evidence of the person himself testifying directly as to what his intention was in the given instance, although such evidence is not conclusive, but is to be considered with all the facts and circumstances of the case in determining the real intention. Hale v. Robertson, 100 Ga. 169, 27 S. E. 937; Alexander v. State, 118 Ga. 26 (4), 44 S. E. 851; Acme Brewing Co. v. Central of Ga. R. & Bkg. Co., 115 Ga. 494 (9), 42 S. E. 8; 7 Enc. of Evidence, 596; 1 Wigmore on Ev. 716.

3. Evidence ⇨151(8)—Of mortgagor's intent to remove from county held properly excluded.

In the trial of a claim interposed by a third person upon such a foreclosure, the court properly excluded the testimony of the mortgagor in answer to the question, "What did you expect to do, or what had you planned to do, in reference to your half of the crop?" the answer being, "I had planned to dispose of my part of the crop, and put the money in my pocket, and go back to Atlanta without paying off the mortgage." Such testimony, while in principle admissible, failed to show either when the plan existed or was to be executed, so as to connect such intended disposal of the property with any time at or about the date of foreclosure. For the same reason, certain admissions of the mortgagor to a like effect were properly excluded.

4. Chattel mortgages ⇨282—Direction of verdict for third person claiming property on foreclosure before maturity held improper under evidence.

Under the rule expressed in the first division of the syllabus, it was error, however, to direct a verdict for the claimant on the theory that the foreclosure of the mortgage before its maturity was premature; since the mortgagor's testimony for the plaintiff showed that just prior to the foreclosure the mortgagor was planning and actually preparing to leave the county of his residence and go to a city in another county as soon as he could get away, that he had engaged work and actually rented a home in that city, that all he had to do was to load his things and go, and that part of his things were already packed. Nor would the mere fact that the mortgagor was arrested and incarcerated in jail for a period extending from three days before the mortgage was foreclosed until four days thereafter so negative the possibility of his forming and executing an intention to remove from the county as to take such issue from the jury; there being no proof that the charge was non-bailable, but the evidence, on the contrary, showing that he was actually released, and that he removed from the county shortly thereafter. The rule stated in Nussbaum v. Waterman, 9 Ga. App. 56, 58, 70 S. E. 259, does not appear to have been in any wise invoked.

1. Evidence supporting allegations of petition.

The evidence in support of the allegations of the petition, as set out in the second count of the petition, is sufficient to support the verdict for the plaintiff on that count, and the objection made to the admission of evidence in the amended motion for a new trial is without merit.

2. Evidence supporting allegations of petition.

The evidence in support of the allegations of the first count of the petition proved a prima facie case for the plaintiff, and the judgment of nonsuit as to this count should not have been awarded.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Work and labor §4(2)—Promise to pay for valuable services implied.

Where one performs for another with the other's knowledge a useful service of a character that is usually charged for, and the latter expresses no dissent or avails himself of the service, a promise to pay the reasonable value of the service is implied.

4. Appeal and error §719(1), 724(1), 750(1)
—Assignments of error may be on rulings complained of in exceptions.

Under Act approved Aug. 15, 1921, assignments of error need not be taken on exceptions pendente lite, being sufficient if taken only on the rulings therein complained of.

5. Payment §59, 65(6)—An affirmative defense.

In an action to recover the reasonable value of services rendered, payment is an affirmative defense which must be set up and proved by the defendant.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Action by D. S. Stephens, administratrix, against D. Douglas and others. There was a nonsuit as to one count, and a judgment for plaintiff on another count, and defendants bring error, and plaintiff brings cross-error. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and reversed on cross-bill.

J. C. Hale and M. E. O'Neal, both of Bainbridge, for plaintiffs in error.

Jno. R. Wilson and H. C. Harrison, both of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This was a suit on an implied contract, to recover for the value of services rendered by the husband of the plaintiff. The petition contained two counts. The first count was for services rendered on account of the sale of a milling plant, which it is alleged the decedent sold for and on behalf of the defendants, and the claim is based on a quantum meruit for such services. The second count was for services rendered by the decedent husband of the plaintiff as a caretaker of the mill property before its sale, and the claim is for a quantum meruit on this account. At the conclusion of the evidence the trial court granted a motion to nonsuit the case as to the first count, and submitted the second count to the jury, who found a verdict for $175 for the plaintiff. The defendants filed a motion for a new trial, based upon the general grounds and upon exceptions as to the admissibility of certain letters as evidence in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff preserved exceptions pendente lite to the judgment sustaining the motion for a nonsuit on the first count, and in a cross-bill of exceptions error is assigned on that judgment.

[1, 3] 1. The judgment on the main bill of exceptions is affirmed. The evidence for the plaintiff amply supported, if it did not demand, a verdict for the plaintiff on the second count of the petition. She proved that the services were rendered by her deceased husband as a caretaker of the property in question for the defendants and were accepted by them, and that the reasonable value of such services was from $40 to $50 a month. There was no affirmative defense, either by plea or evidence, that such services had been paid for by the defendants.

"It is said that the only difference between an express contract and an implied contract is that in the former all of the terms and conditions are expressed between the parties, while in the latter some one or more of the terms and conditions are implied by law from the conduct of the parties. Thus, where one performs for another, with the other's knowledge, a useful service of a character that is usually charged for, and the latter expresses no dissent or avails himself of the service, a promise to pay the reasonable value of the service is implied." 6 R. C. L. 587.

[2, 4] 2. A motion is made in this court to dismiss the cross-bill of exceptions by virtue of the decision of this court in Guthrie v. Peninsular Naval Stores Co., 107 S. E. 280, on the ground that there is no assignment of error upon the exceptions pendente lite, but only on the ruling therein complained of. There are other decisions by this court and the Supreme Court to the same effect. Evidently to meet these rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, the Legislature at its late session enacted the following law:

"An act to regulate and prescribe certain matters of review, procedure and practice in the courts of this state, and for other purposes.

"Whereas, it is the policy of the law of this state, as declared in section 6183 of the Civil Code, that no case shall be dismissed by the reviewing courts for want of technical conformity to the statutes or rules of practice, where there is enough in the bill of exceptions and transcript of record to enable the court to ascertain substantially the real question in the case which the parties seek to have decided therein; and whereas the refusal of the court to pass upon any question made is to that extent a dismissal of the case; and whereas useless duplication in records and briefs should be avoided:

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that when the final bill of exceptions shows that exceptions pendente lite were properly filed in the trial court, and where the contents of such exceptions pendente lite are recited in the bill of exceptions, or a copy appears in the transcript of record, an assignment of error in the final bill of exceptions, either upon the exceptions pendente lite or upon the rulings therein excepted to, shall be held to be sufficient."

This act was approved August 15, 1921. The cross-bill of exceptions in the present case, as to the assignment of error therein, is in full compliance with the requirements of the statute, and therefore the motion to dismiss is refused.

[5] The judgment of the trial court on the cross-bill of exceptions is reversed. The evidence in support of the quantum meruit covered by the first count of the petition establishes the plaintiff's claim that the services therein claimed to have been rendered by her deceased husband to the defendants were in fact rendered, that these services were accepted by the defendants, and that the value of the services was 5 per cent., or $300, on the amount of the sum arising from the sale of the property of the defendants by the decedent. The defendants had filed a plea of general issue, but they introduced no evidence in support thereof, and moved for a nonsuit, which was granted as to the first count of the petition. The defendants insist that the nonsuit was demanded because the evidence failed to show that the defendants had failed and refused to pay the deceased husband of the plaintiff, or his estate, the reasonable value of such services, and that such allegation, and proof thereof, is necessary before a recovery would be authorized. This seems to be the general rule.

"The breach of the promise in general assumpsit is the neglect and refusal of the defendant to perform it—that is, to pay. As in special assumpsit, it is an essential part of the cause of action, and must in all cases be stated." Shipman's Common-Law Pleading (2d Ed.), 225; 40 Cyc. 2841; 5 C. J. 1397.

But a different rule seems to have been announced by the Supreme Court of this state. In Christian v. Bryant, 102 Ga. 561, 27 S. E. 666 it is held that—

"Payment is an affirmative defense which should be set up and proved by the defendant."

And in the same case it is further held:

"An action on account for personalty alleged to have been sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant is sufficiently supported by evidence showing the sale and delivery at the price sued for, and it is not incumbent on the plaintiff to show negatively a failure on the part of the defendant to pay." (Italics ours.)

See Sanier v. Huguley, 91 Ga. 793, 18 S. E. 39.

"Ordinarily, where suit is brought for goods sold, it would be sufficient, to shift the burden, for the plaintiff to show that the goods were sold and delivered; and in such case payment is an affirmative defense which should be set up and proved by the defendant." Armour v. Bluthenthal, 9 Ga. App. 712, 72 S. E. 170.

"A petition that alleges the employment of plaintiff by defendant, performance of stated services, with a general statement of the items of work done, the aggregate value of the same, and the completion of the contract of employment, sets forth a cause of action." Kilkenny Plantation v. Furber, 130 Ga. 492 (1), 61 S. E. 14.

By authority of these decisions, the judgment granting the nonsuit as to the claim for services set out in the first count of the petition must be reversed, and as to that count a new trial granted.

Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions; reversed on cross-bill.

1. Banks and banking §189—Bank, promising to pay another person's draft, held liable as on an original undertaking.

Where a bank, at the request of one of its customers, notifies another bank that it will pay another person's draft upon him with bill of lading attached, and the bank thus notified, acting solely on the faith of this promise, advances to the drawer the money represented by the draft, the bank making the promise is liable to the other bank as on an original undertaking within the scope of its general business, and its status is not that of a mere surety, pledging its credit solely for the benefit of the drawee. In such a transaction the promise of the drawee to protect the draft is not to be taken as made to the drawer, or to the bank making the advance, but as given to his own bank, which, in consideration of credit thus extended by it to its own customer, and in furtherance of the agreement made by and between them, has agreed directly and alone to repay the advance to be made by the other bank.

2. Pleading §270—Amended demurrer, claiming that act was ultra vires, could be filed by corporation at any time.

Objections that an amendment to a demurrer, alleging that act of defendant bank was ultra vires, should have been filed at the appearance term, and that the matter was one for a plea in abatement, and not for a demurrer, were without merit; the demurrer being in the nature of a general demurrer, or a motion to dismiss, which could be filed at any time.

3. Evidence §31—Judicial notice taken of charter of bank.

Error from City Court of Athens; J. D. Bradwell, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Lumpkin against the People's Bank of Athens. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Bank of Lumpkin sued the People's Bank of Athens, alleging, in substance, that the defendant bank was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $5,763.16; this indebtedness being based on three drafts, drawn by Frank S. Singer on the Creekmore Company, of Athens, Ga., which drafts were to be honored by the People's Bank of Athens. The drafts were drawn in accordance with a telegram sent by the People's Bank of Athens to the Bank of Lumpkin on February 14, 1918, as follows:

"We will honor drafts with bill of lading attached on Creekmore covering 2,500 bushels of peas at $3.50 a bushel."

In accordance with this telegram the Bank of Lumpkin paid Frank S. Singer for the drafts and sent them to the People's Bank of Athens, with the bills of lading attached, and the People's Bank of Athens failed and refused to pay the drafts. The People's Bank of Athens, before pleading to the merits, filed a demurrer to the petition, the demurrer was overruled, and no exceptions were taken to this judgment. The defendant thereupon amended the demurrer, and demurred to the amended petition of the plaintiff, and in the amendment to the demurrer contended that the act of the defendant, through its officers, in which the promise was made to honor the drafts on the Creekmore Company, as stated, was ultra vires, being an act of suretyship, and beyond the authority of the bank. This ground of the demurrer was sustained, and the suit dismissed, and the case came to this court on exceptions to this judgment.

T. T. James, of Lumpkin, and Shackelford & Meadow and Thos. J. Shackelford, all of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

H. C. Tuck and Lamar C. Rucker, both of Athens, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2, 3] The amendment to the demurrer contending that the act of the defendant bank was ultra vires, was objected to by the plaintiff on the ground that it came too late, as it should have been filed at the appearance term, being in its nature a special demurrer, and an exception was taken to the overruling of this objection. Objection was also made on the ground that this was a matter for a plea in abatement and not for demurrer. We do not think there is any merit in either of these objections to the filing of the demurrer, as in our opinion the demurrer was in the nature of a general demurrer, or a motion to dismiss, and could be filed at any time, and it was proper to make the question by general demurrer, and not by plea, as the court would have the right to take judicial cognizance of the charter of the defendant bank, filed in the office of the secretary of state. But the view we take of the main question in this case renders immaterial the questions thus made.

[1, 4] The question is whether the promise of the defendant bank, in its telegram to the plaintiff, was an original undertaking within the scope of its general business, or was a pledging of its credit solely for the benefit of the drawee of the drafts, in which event it would be an ultra vires act, and the bank would not be liable. The principle is well established, especially by the decisions of the courts of this state in the cases of Bank of Omega v. Wingo, etc., Co., 19 Ga. App. 177, 91 S. E. 251, and First National Bank of Tallapoosa v. Monroe, 135 Ga. 614, 69 S. E. 1123, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, that a bank cannot lend its credit to another, cannot become indorser for another, and cannot guarantee the payment of the debt of another solely for the benefit of the debtor. Under the decisions in the case of Bank of Omega v. Wingo, etc., Co., supra, we think it clear that the promise of the Athens bank in the present case constituted an original undertaking and not an act of suretyship. Upon the receipt of the telegram from the Athens bank, agreeing to honor the drafts and pay for the 2,500 bushels of peas at $3.50 a bushel, and relying upon its promise, the Bank of Lumpkin advanced the money and deposited the drafts with the bills of lading attached, and thereby the peas purchased became the property of the Athens bank, possession of which it was entitled to on the payment of the drafts, and thereafter the Bank of Lumpkin relied solely upon the Athens bank for payment.

The Athens bank's telegram of acceptance to the Bank of Lumpkin was conditioned only upon two things: That the peas should be paid for at $3.50 per bushel, and that the bills of lading should be attached to the drafts. This was a perfectly legitimate banking transaction. The Bank of Lumpkin had a right to rely upon the promise of the Athens bank. Indeed, it had a right to rely upon the inference that the Athens bank was to pay these drafts out of funds that it had on hand of the Creekmore Company on whom the drafts were drawn. The Bank of Lumpkin had the right to assume that it was a legitimate banking transaction, and that the Creekmore Company had funds in the hands of the Athens bank out of which to pay these drafts. The transaction, tersely stated, is as follows:

Singer, at Lumpkin, had peas to sell. Creekmore Company, a customer of the People's Bank of Athens, desired to buy these peas. These parties had to use the banks to carry out this commercial transaction. If the People's Bank had been at Lumpkin, and had desired to furnish the money to the Creekmore Company to buy these peas, the bank could have taken the bills of lading in its name and given the purchase money over to the Creekmore Company, or to Singer; and if such had been the case, it could not have been said that the bank, in advancing the money, was acting outside of its charter. But the People's Bank was not at Lumpkin, and could not pay over the money to Singer for the peas for the account of its customer, the Creekmore Company; therefore the People's Bank used the wire and the services of the Bank of Lumpkin. It wired the Bank of Lumpkin to pay for the peas, 2,500 bushels, at $3.50 a bushel, and to draw the drafts on the Creekmore Company for the amount, with the bills of lading attached.

In our opinion this was an original undertaking in which it was agreed, in effect, to pay back the money to the Bank of Lumpkin, if the Bank of Lumpkin advanced it under the instructions of the People's Bank; and the Bank of Lumpkin carried out the instructions given it by the People's Bank to the very letter and paid for the peas at $3.50 a bushel, 2,500 bushels, and drew the drafts on the Creekmore Company through the People's Bank, with the bills of lading attached. The transaction between the two banks was a usual and ordinary banking transaction. If such transactions were ultra vires, banks would be crippled and commercial transactions greatly delayed and hindered. We therefore conclude that the learned trial judge erred in sustaining the demurrer to the petition on the ground covered by the amended demurrer, to the effect that the act of the Athens bank was ultra vires, and for that reason not enforceable.

Judgment reversed.

The statutory presumption of negligence against the railroad company, which arose on proof of the killing of the cows, was not clearly and completely rebutted by the positive and undisputed evidence of the employees in charge of the running of the trains, and the evidence was in conflict on the subject of negligence. The evidence was conflicting, and the sole question is a question of fact. There was sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict, and this verdict has the approval of the trial judge.

MILLER et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. Landlord and tenant ¶190(2) — Partial eviction excuses liability to pay rent, if entire.

If rent is entire, tenant is released from liability to pay during continuance of a partial eviction, though he continued to occupy the remainder of the premises.

2. Railroads ¶133(4)—Rent on lease of materials for lessee's spur track held recoverable, though lessor removed its connection track.

Under a contract whereby a railroad company agreed to lease rails and materials to a mining company for its spur track at an agreed rental, fixed at a percentage of the market value, with right to terminate rental payments by acquiring the materials within a certain time, and the railroad company also agreed to furnish the use of a connection track on its right of way at a rental fixed at the cost of maintenance, to be paid so long as the lessee used the connection, the lessor being given the exclusive right to control and operate said connection track, and right to exercise its ownership, held, that the lessor's removal of the connection track on the lessee's discontinuance of the use of its spur did not defeat recovery of rental for the rails and materials; the rent not being entire, and such removal not constituting a partial eviction, the covenants in the contract being independent.

3. Covenants ¶26—Whether dependent or independent depends on intention.

Covenants are dependent or independent, according to the intention of the parties and the good sense of the case.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County.

Suit by the Southern Railway Company against J. E. Miller, administrator of W. B. Bennett, deceased, and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. T. Stant, of Bristol, for appellants.

Pennington, Price & Jones, of Bristol, for appellee.

SAUNDERS, J. In September, 1919, the Southern Railway Company filed its bill in equity in the circuit court of Washington county against J. E. Miller, administrator of W. B. Bennett, deceased, Carrie I. Luther, Essie Marie Updegraff, and Donald Bennett, to attach the estate of the said Carrie I. Luther, Essie M. Updegraff, and Donald W. Bennett, and thereby enforce the collection of a claim alleged to be due from the estate of the said W. B. Bennett to the said railroad company. This claim arose in this wise:

The Southern Mining & Manufacturing Company entered into a written contract with the Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company on May 20, 1907, relating to a certain short line of railroad leading from Benhams in Washington county, a point on the said Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company's road, to a proposed limestone and marble quarry in the county of Washington, the property of the said manufacturing company. The estate of W. B. Bennett now occupies the place of the Southern Mining & Manufacturing Company, and the Southern Railway Company that of the Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company.

The Southern Railway, plaintiff in the bill, supra, claimed that certain rents were due it from the estate of said Bennett.

The sole question for decision is whether the railway company, under the proper interpretation of the contract supra, is entitled to collect its claim in full. The defendants demurred to the plaintiff's bill. This demurrer was sustained and leave given to amend the bill at bar. This was done. Thereupon the defendants filed their answer to the amended bill, admitting the contract relied upon by the plaintiff, and a portion of the claim for rent, to wit, $151.53, but denying any further liability. The case was heard upon the bill, answer, exhibits, and an agreement of facts, and a decree entered awarding the plaintiff the full amount of rent claimed. An appeal from said decree by the defendants brings the controversy before this court for review.

The contract between the parties contains a number of covenants, and to reach a proper determination of this controversy it will be necessary to determine whether these covenants are dependent, or independent. There are no controverted facts.

The indenture between the original parties who are represented by the plaintiff and defendant now before the court, recites that:

"Whereas, the first party [i. e., the mining and manufacturing corporation] desires a connection with the second party's main line at Benham's, as shown on the map, and also wishes to lease from the said second party, for use on its said line of railroad, rails, frogs, switches, spikes, bolts, and splices, and the party of the second part has agreed to afford said connection and lease said rails, etc., to the first party on the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned: Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, it is agreed between the parties hereto, as follows."

According to paragraph 2, the railroad company agreed to lease to the mining company for the consideration stated in the next succeeding paragraph the necessary rails, spikes, frogs, etc., and to lay and surface the tracks whenever the grading had been done, and the ties and timber furnished as provided by paragraph 1. By the terms of paragraph 3, the mining company agreed to pay the railway company as a rental 6 per cent. on the total market value of said rails, etc., and the cost of laying and surfacing the tracks as per statement, etc.

With respect to the connection, it was provided by paragraph 10 that the mining company should build its railroad to the right of way of the railroad company, and should furnish for such track all necessary materials, including rails, etc., and do the necessary grading.

By paragraph 11, the railroad company was to lay said track, and the mining company to reimburse it for the cost of same.

By paragraph 15, the mining company agreed, so long as it used said track, to pay to the railroad company the actual cost of maintaining same, bills for the cost of maintenance to be paid annually. Reference will be made hereafter in their appropriate connection to other provisions of this contract. The plaintiff claims that, pursuant to the contract, supra, rent was due from November 1, 1917, at the rate of $42.14 a month up to July 1, 1919; the total being $884.94 principal and $44.24 interest.

The defendants admit an indebtedness of $151.53, but set up as a defense to the balance of the claim that—

"In September, 1917, the plaintiff without giving the notice required by clause twelve of the contract, or any notice, took up the connection track, and removed from the premises the materials used in making said connection, and had not restored or replaced the same up to the bringing of this suit, or until now, in violation of the terms of the contract."

With reference to this charge that the railroad company discontinued the connection track, the following citation is made from the agreed facts:

(3) "For the purpose of additional safety to the complainants on the main track, in September, 1917, without giving notice to the defendants, the complainants removed the connection track referred to in the contract, and have not replaced the same. At that time the defendants' railroad was not being used for any purpose, and had not been used since operations ceased, as stated above, and defendants, after the track was discontinued, not knowing of the disconnection, made no objection thereto, and no request to have the same reconnected."

Paragraph 2 of the agreed facts gives the date when the defendants discontinued the operation of their road, as well as other details:

(2) "W. B. Bennett died June 11, 1916. The estate of W. B. Bennett operated said plant by W. M. Lundy, superintendent, after Bennett's death, but ceased all operations soon after February, 1917, and did not resume, or attempt to resume, operations thereafter, but left the property in charge of a caretaker while not in use, though the machinery and equipment remained at the quarry which the railroad was built to serve."

[1] The contention of the defendants is that, as a condition precedent to recovery of rent for the rails, etc., it was necessary for the plaintiff as a matter of pleading to allege, and as a matter of fact to prove, that the connection track was ready for use at any and all times during the period for which rent was demanded, and the fact that confessedly during that period the said track, due to the voluntary acts of the plaintiff, was not capable of use, is a bar to such recovery. This discontinuance of the connection track the defendants treat as an eviction from a portion of the leased premises, which operates to defeat the recovery of any rent thereafter so long as it continues. In support of this contention various authorities from this and other states are cited.

"An eviction occurs whenever a landlord wrongfully deprives a tenant of any part of the leased premises; and if the rent is entire, the tenant is excused from his obligation to pay during the continuance of the eviction, though he continue to occupy the remainder of the premises. * * * The landlord cannot by his wrong apportion the rent." Williston on Contracts, § 891.

In Briggs v. Hall, 4 Leigh (31 Va.) 484, 26 Am. Dec. 326, it appears that the plaintiff leased the defendant a farm for one year, for seventy dollars. During the year the landlord entered upon the leased premises, and mowed and carried away the hay on four acres without the consent and against the will of the tenant. At the end of the year the landlord sued for the entire rent. Upon proof of the foregoing facts the court gave judgment for the lessee, and this was affirmed; this court holding that for such partial eviction the whole rent was extinguished.

See, also, Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Grat. (63 Va.) 109, 120, affirming the proposition that if the—

"lessor himself wrongfully deprives the tenant of the whole or any part of the premises, the tenant is discharged from the payment of the whole rent until the possession is restored."

[2, 3] There are two difficulties about the application of the principle announced by these authorities to the facts of the case in judgment:

First, the rent was not entire. A stipulated rent was agreed to be paid for the rails etc. This rent according to paragraph 3, supra, was 6 per cent. on the total market value of the rails, etc., delivered on the ground, and the cost of laying and surfacing the track as per statement to be rendered. The defendants did not lease a short line of completed road from the plaintiff. The road was the property of the defendants. Said defendants leased certain personal property from the plaintiff, to be used on their road at an agreed rent, with the right under paragraph 4 of the contract, within three years from the date thereof, to terminate the rental payments, and acquire the property by paying to said plaintiff the value of the rails, etc. Further, a special compensation, or rent, was provided for the use of the connection track, by paragraph 15 of said contract, which is as follows:

(15) "The first party, so long as it uses said connection, agrees to pay to the second party the actual cost of maintaining same, bills for the cost of maintaining to be paid annually on or before the 20th day of January, for the year ending December 31st preceding."

Another difficulty in applying the principle cited is that under the facts of this case there has been no eviction in the sense contemplated by Briggs v. Hall, and kindred cases. The railroad company did not lease to the mining company a spur track of 3 miles, or more, and a connection track. The spur track, as pointed out supra, was the property of the mining company. The connection track was on the right of way of the railroad company, and possession of same was never delivered to the defendants. Paragraph 14 of the contract provides that the railroad company—

"shall have the exclusive right to control and operate said connection track, and the right to exercise its ownership and franchise in and to the same in all respects as if the said track had been constructed at its sole expense."

Paragraph 12 of said contract provides that:

"The ownership of all the materials in said connection track which are situated on the second party's right of way shall be and remain vested in the second party," etc.

In substance, the contract between the parties was a lease on agreed terms of certain personal property for the use of the mining company on its own road, and an agreement on the part of the railroad company to furnish a connection, or liaison, to use a word greatly in vogue at present, between said road and the main line, the compensation or rental for this link, when in use, being specifically fixed at the actual cost of maintenance.

Undoubtedly the railroad company was bound to furnish and maintain this connection track, for the uses and purposes of the mining company when operating its property, and for injury to the said company resulting from its failure to afford this connection, the railroad company would be liable in damages. But it does not follow, from this admitted liability in damages for breach of its contract to furnish a connection, that the contract to afford this connection was a dependent covenant. If the covenant relating to the personal property, and the rent therefor, and the covenant to afford a connection track, are not dependent covenants, then a breach of the latter would not be a bar to recovery of rent under the former.

There is much law upon the subject of dependent and independent covenants. The following is taken from 13 Corpus Juris, p. 567:

"Agreements are mutual and dependent, where performance by one party is conditional on and subject to performance by the other, and a party who seeks performance, must show performance, or a tender or readiness to perform on his part. Covenants, or stipulations, are independent when the consideration of the stipulation on the one side, is the mutual promise on the other, and an actual performance, or tender, is not required, but the remedy on both sides is by action. [Italics supplied.] While the earlier cases recognized exceedingly nice and refined distinctions for the purpose of determining the character of the covenants, the rule is now thoroughly settled that the question of whether they are dependent, or independent, rests on the intention of the parties, to be determined from the sense of the entire contract, rather than from any particular form of expression."

To the same effect are the Virginia cases:

"Covenants are dependent or independent, according to the intention * * * of the parties, and the good sense of the case." Brockenbrough v. Ward's Adm'r, 4 Rand. (25 Va.) 352.

"Covenants, though dependent in form, will be construed as mutual and independent, when it is necessary to effect justice between the parties thereto. A party having covenanted to do two things, one of which he has done, will be allowed to maintain an action for the part done, as upon an independent covenant." Todd v. Summers, 2 Grat. (43 Va.) 163, 44 Am. Dec. 379.

"There is perhaps no branch of the law in which it is to be found a larger number of decisions or a greater apparent conflict of authorities than that in which the effort has been made to define the dependence and independence of covenants, and to designate the class to which any given case in dispute is to be referred. The great effort, however, in the more recent decisions, has been to discard, as far as possible, all rules of construction founded on nice and artificial reasoning, and to make the meaning and intention of the parties, collected from all the parts of the instrument rather than from a few technical expressions, the guide in determining the character and force of their respective undertakings." Roach v. Dickinson, 9 Grat. (50 Va.) 153, 157.

See, also, Allemong v. Banks, 103 Va. 249, 48 S. E. 897, as follows:

"Courts construe agreements so as to prevent a failure of justice, and hold dependent covenants to be independent when the necessity of the case and ends of justice require it, notwithstanding the form."

An analogous situation to the one revealed in the case in judgment is presented in these contracts in which the landlord leases property and agrees to make repairs, and the lessee takes possession and agrees to pay rent. Such covenants are generally considered to be independent covenants. See cases cited in 16 Ruling Case Law, p. 943, footnote No. 14.

"Under a broad interpretation that the lease as thus amended demised a building to be used for the purposes of a theatre, in connection with which the plaintiff covenanted to provide additional means of exit if called for by the public authorities, a failure to perform the promise does not constitute a defense to this action. When considered as a further covenant, this agreement is strictly analogous to the ordinary undertaking of the landlord to make outside repairs, which is independent of the lessee's obligation to pay the rent reserved, and any neglect by the plaintiff to make the improvements promised, even if by force of the statute the premises without them became unfitted for use as a theatre, did not by reason of the breach so long as the defendant chose to occupy them, give to him any right to decline payment of the rent." Taylor v. Finnigan, 189 Mass. 568, 78 N. E. 203, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) pp. 973, 976.

"The lease does not express or imply that repair is a condition precedent to obligation to pay rent; that repair must be made before payment of rent. The covenant could not apply after the fire. For its breach, if there had been any shown, the defendant could sue for damages in a separate action, or recoup from the rent. The landlord's covenant to repair and the tenant's to pay rent are independent covenants, and at common law a breach of the former is no defense to an action on the latter. And this still remains the law, both in England and the United States." Arbenz v. Exley Watkins Co., 52 W. Va. 476, 44 S. E. 149, 61 L. R. A. 957, 960.

"A breach of a covenant on the part of a lessor is not a legal excuse for the nonpayment of rent. If a landlord fails to keep his part of the agreement, then a tenant can recover such damages as he may show he is entitled to, and when called upon to pay the rent may, as a defense, set up a breach of the lease, and offset the damages which he has sustained against the rent due. * * * A tenant, when called upon to pay rent, must do one of two things—he must either pay the rent due, or else restore possession of the premises to the landlord. He cannot keep both the rent and the possession." Douglas v. Chesebrough Building Co., 56 App. Div. 403, 67 N. Y. Supp. p. 755.

A very complete statement of this rule, or principle, is found in a case cited in a note on page 978, 34 L. R. A.:

"The contract sued on does not belong to that class of covenants called conditional and dependent, in which the performance of one depends upon the prior performance of another, but to that class known in the law as mutual and independent covenants, where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have sustained by a breach of the covenant in his favor, and where it is no excuse to the defendant to allege a breach of the covenants of the plaintiff in bar of his action. The effect of the charge is to exonerate the defendant from any liability whatever for the slightest breach of the plaintiff's covenants, whether the defendant has been actually damaged or not, and leave him to the use and enjoyment of the plaintiff's property for nothing. If actually damaged by the plaintiff's nonperformance of his covenants, the defendant has the right of separate action, or his right in this action, to prove and recoup his damages, and the jury should have been so instructed. The reason of the rule of the law is that, where a person has received a part of the consideration for which he entered into an agreement, it would be unjust, because he had not had the whole, that he should therefore be permitted to enjoy that part without paying for it. The law, in such case, obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, and leaves to him his remedy, by recoupment or otherwise, to recover any actual damages he may have sustained in not having received the whole consideration. 2 Pars. Cont. 531, 532." Smith v. Wiley, 1 Baxt. (Tenn.) 418.

The contract in the case in judgment does not expressly state, or imply, that the maintenance of the connection track, whether it is needed or not for the purposes of the mining company, is a "condition precedent to obligation" to pay the agreed return for the rails, spikes, etc.

A special arrangement of compensation for the use of the connection track is provided by paragraph 15, that compensation being the actual cost of maintaining same. It is not an unreasonable deduction from the wording of this paragraph that it was in the contemplation of the parties that this connection track could be discontinued, certainly that it need not be maintained, when it was not required for the purpose of the mining company. By the very terms used, the mining company is to pay for this connection track "the actual costs of maintaining same," only "so long as it uses said connection." The fair inference from, or implication of, this language, is that during such period, or periods, as the mining company did not use said track, the railroad company could not collect from said mining company the cost of maintaining same. A corollary from this would be that during such periods the railroad would be under no obligation to maintain said track, since maintenance under such circumstances would be a vain thing.

A further indication that the covenants relating to rental for the rails and compensation for the use of the connection track were independent covenants is afforded by paragraph 12 of the contract, which provides that the railroad company may, "at any time when in its judgment the traffic received from the first party's railroad does not justify the maintenance of said track, upon 30 days' written notice to the first party, abandon said connection, and enter upon and remove from the premises all or any part of the materials thereon," and by paragraph 5 conveying in trust the right of way of the short line to secure the "payment of the rent herein provided, as well as the payment of the value of the rails, etc., hereby leased, and the cost of laying and surfacing the track."

These separate provisions to secure the railroad company, the one in respect of the rental of the rails, etc., and the other in respect of the use of the connection track, are hardly compatible with the theory that the right to recover the rent was dependent upon the maintenance of the connection track, whether there was any occasion for its use or not. There was a clear right on the one hand to demand, and an equally clear obligation on the other to construct and operate, when required for the uses of the mining company, the connection track; but the remedy on both sides, whether for the railroad company seeking payment for the cost of maintenance, or for the mining company complaining of failure to furnish connection, was by action.

The liability of the mining company to pay the agreed rental for the rails, etc., and the right of the railroad company to collect this rent, was not dependent upon the use of these materials. It was a matter of indifference to the railroad company, in one sense, whether these materials were used or not. Such use was the concern of the mining company. A man who lends money is entitled to his interest, whether the borrower uses this money productively, or buries it in a napkin. The mining company could require the railroad company to furnish the connection at any time that same was needed for its purposes, and for any failure to discharge its obligation in this respect the railroad company was liable in damages to the party of the other part. It was perfectly competent in the present proceeding for the Bennett estate to set up and recover any damages that it had suffered by the failure of the railroad company to maintain said track, and its failure to do so was undoubtedly due to the fact that a party which had discontinued its own enterprise, and therefore had no occasion to use the connection track, could not show that it had sustained any damages by reason of the acts of said company in the above respect. Indeed, not only did the defendants cease work at their quarry, and discontinue the operations of their short line, in February, 1917, but this cessation was so complete during the succeeding period that they were not even aware of the discontinuance of the connection line.

Citing the language of the stipulation, the defendants, "not knowing of the disconnection, made no objection thereto, and made no request to have the same reconnected." The trial court evidently regarded the covenant of the contract relating to rental for the materials furnished by the railroad company and the covenant making provision for the use of the connection track as independent covenants. With that conclusion we concur. The defendants lose no rights by the payment of the rent demanded in this suit, and, if it is so desired, can proceed hereafter against the plaintiff by independent action, or proceeding, to secure any reparation, or enforce any right to which they are entitled under the contract in question.

We find no error in the action of the trial court, and the same is affirmed.

Affirmed.

BRIZENDINE v. PAITSEL

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

Easements §—17(1)—Right of way as between grantees of common grantor held controlled by the deeds, and not to include way as previously used.

Where owner of a tract of land conveyed a portion, including land being used as a roadway, without reservation as to use of roadway, to one purchaser, and conveyed to second purchaser another portion, including the right of "ingress and egress through and over the road lying between land of B. (first purchaser) and land of a third purchaser," and where description in deed to first purchaser and map filed therewith showed conclusively that grantor intended to convey to first purchaser the bed of such roadway, second purchaser's successor in interest was not entitled to use the old roadway, though first purchaser for 14 years permitted roadway to be used, and though the land between first purchaser's land and third purchaser's land could not be used as roadway until after difficulties and obstructions had been overcome.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roanoke County.

Bill by F. A. Paitzel against M. Zadok Brizendine. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Hart & Hart, of Roanoke, for appellant.
Kime & Kime, of Roanoke, for appellee.

SAUNDERS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Roanoke county, pronounced at its January term, 1921, establishing the right of the appellee (F. A. Paitzel) to the use of a roadway across the lands of the appellant, Mrs. M. Z. Brizendine, and directing the said M. Z. Brizendine to remove any and all obstructions in and across the roadway referred to in complainant's bill, and to permit said complainant to have the free and unrestrained use of said roadway, as the same appears upon a survey filed with the deposition of R. E. Magee, and made a part of this record.

This decree was entered in a suit brought by F. A. Paitzel (appellee) against the said M. Z. Brizendine (appellant), alleging that he was entitled to the roadway, supra, described as a "right of ingress and egress through and over the road lying between Rowan and Williamson, and also over and through the lands of C. T. Lukens, sold by Mrs. Gertrude Watts to the said Lukens."

Paitzel was the vendee of one Harriet McGeehan, who was the vendee of Mrs. Watts. Rowan is the same as Brizendine, the Brizendine tract having been bought by the former, and conveyed by Mrs. Watts to the latter. Williamson was a contiguous owner to the Watts land, his farm adjoining that portion of the said Watts land which was later conveyed to Mrs. Brizendine. After setting up in detail the grounds on which a roadway was claimed through the Brizendine tract, complaint proceeded to allege that Mrs. Brizendine, or some one acting for her, had obstructed this road by erecting a fence across its course, thereby completely blocking same. An injunction was asked against this interference, and an order directing Mrs. Brizendine to remove the obstructions.

The defendant answered this bill, denying that she had closed, or interfered with, a public roadway, or the private right of way of the complainant, or of any other party. As affirmative matter, the answer alleged that defendant's fence, as shown by her plat, was on her line. The case was heard upon the bill, answer, exhibits, and depositions, and the decree, supra, was awarded. From this decree an appeal was secured by Mrs. Brizendine, and the entire controversy is now before this court for review and determination.

The roadway set out in the bill of complainant lies between the red lines on the survey referred to, supra. This survey will be reproduced later in the appropriate connection. The history of the roadway is as follows:

Some years ago J. Allen Watts owned a large boundary of land north of the village of Big Lick, later to become the city of Roanoke. At the beginning of the year 1906, Mrs. Gertrude Lee Watts, in her own right and as executrix of J. Allen Watts, was seized and possessed of a large part of this Watts land, and in her own right and as executrix she thereafter sold off from the inclusive boundary so held by her various small parcels to successive vendees. The first of these sales was made as of February 8, 1906. By deed of that date Mrs. Watts conveyed to Mrs. Zadok Brizendine a small parcel of land, containing 2.1 acres, more or less. The metes and bounds of this tract are given in the deed, and the description concludes as follows:

"And containing 2.104 acres, as is shown by the map which is hereto attached, and made a part of this deed."

It will be observed that this tract was not sold subject to a right of way for the benefit of the balance of Mrs. Watts' lands. The map which was referred to and made a part of the above deed shows a road 18 feet wide, north of and entirely outside of Mrs. Brizendine's land, and lying between her land and the Williamson land. This map which was made by McIlwaine & Smith, civil engineers, and identified by Smith in his deposition in this case, is reproduced at this point.

In this connection the following citations are made from the testimony of the witness Smith:

Direct Examination.

"Q. I here hand you a plat, or survey, made by McIlwaine & Smith, and ask if you are the same Smith there mentioned?

"A. I am.

"Q. Did you make that plat, and, if so, did you do the surveying from which the plat was made?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Does that plat correctly show the land of Mrs. Z. Brizendine?

"A. Yes. It does according to the description in the deed."

On February 27, 1906, Mrs. Watts conveyed to Harriet McGeehan a tract of 10 acres, a portion of the Watts land supra. This deed contains the following grant of a right of egress and ingress over the road between Williamson and Rowan (i. e., Mrs. Brizendine):

"The said McGeehan is hereby expressly granted the right of ingress and egress through and over the road lying between said Rowan and Williamson; and also over and through the lands of C. T. Lukens, sold by the said Watts to the said Lukens."

This right of egress and ingress is not given, or undertaken to be given, over the land sold to Mrs. Brizendine, but is "through and over the road (italics supplied) between said Rowan and Williamson"; that is to say, through and over the road lying between the lands of said Rowan (i. e., Brizendine) and Williamson.

It seems to have been the practice of Mrs. Watts to make and deliver a map, or plat, of the land sold, as a part of her conveyance. The description of the land sold to Harriet McGeehan concludes with these words:

"As shown by plat hereto attached, and which is made a part of this deed."

This map is herewith reproduced.

It will be noted that this map shows an 18-foot road, but the northern edge, or line, of this road is apparently coincident, for a distance not indicated, with the outside boundary of the Williamson land.

The salient facts relating to the roadway across the land of Mrs. Brizendine are that at one time when the lands afterwards sold to F. A. Paitsel, Mrs. Brizendine, and C. T. Lukens were component parts of the Watts farm, there was a farm road beginning on the said farm, and in its course running successively in the order of the above names, over the lands subsequently sold to said parties. This road was used by Col. William Watts and his successors in title to the Watts lands as an outlet on that side of the farm to the turnpike.

In this connection the following extracts from the testimony of C. T. Lukens will be helpful:

Examination of C. T. Lukens.

"Q. Did the south line of the Williamson estate join the southeastern part of the Watts farm?

"A. It did, yes.

"Q. Is there an old fence along that line?

"A. Yes, there is a fence there.

"Q. About how old is that fence?

"A. I don't know; it has been there ever since I have known that farm. I think, in a more or less condition, it has been there 25 years or longer. It has been there ever since I have known the place. * * *

"Q. Do I understand you to say that that right of way is right up against the Williamson line, or is it off a piece from the Williamson line, and at the bottom of that bank just to the south of the Williamson fence?

"A. Well, it is along there between the Brizendine fence and the Williamson line. I don't know how close it is to the line. There is no land between the road and the line there that is tillable, or anything like that. It is rough through there.

"Q. What I mean to get clear in the record, does the road run right up against the fence, or is there a bank between the fence and the road?

"A. I haven't been up there for some time, but I think the road was supposed to be along the line of the Williamson farm, because there is a private road through there, and people simply went through there, as I understand, by permission of the Watts family, and the roadway followed the Williamson line around, but when they sold that piece to me, they reserved the right of way through there, an 18-foot right of way."

The interest in the above road, the title to the fee, and the right to use the same, inhered in the owner of the Watts lands. No authority is needed to support the proposition that so long as this state of facts existed the owners of this estate could shift the location of this road at will. There was no one to gainsay such action, for there was no one, other than the owners, with any right in this road, its use, its establishment, or its discontinuance. When Mrs. Watts, the successor in title to Col. William Watts, and his son, J. Allen Watts, sold the 2-acre tract to Mrs. Brizendine, she owned the lands subsequently sold to Harriet McGeehan, and by the latter in turn, and in part, sold to F. A. Paitsel. Prior to that time, to wit, in December, 1904, Mrs. Watts had sold to C. T. Lukens a tract of land adjoining the Brizendine land on the southeast side of same. This land was sold to Lukens subject to a right of way for the benefit of the residue of the Watts farm, and of the party of the first part (i. e., Mrs. Gertrude Watts), and of any person purchasing all, or any part, of said farm from her. This provision of the Lukens deed, subjecting the Lukens land to a right of way for the benefit of the residue of the Watts farm, is noteworthy, when contrasted with the entire absence of a like provision in the deed to Mrs. Brizendine. Unless Mrs. Watts had access to the Lukens land, it was futile to reserve a right of way across the same, and if it was necessary to cross the Brizendine land to reach the Lukens land, it would seem that for her own protection she would have sold the Brizendine land subject to a right of way. The absence of such a reservation supports the contention of the defendant that the approach of Paisel to the Lukens land is by a road outside of the limits of the Brizendine tract. At the time Mrs. Watts sold the land to Lukens, the roadway in controversy undoubtedly ran in part over the land subsequently sold to Mrs. Brizendine. But the Brizendine land and the McGeehan land, later in part the Paisel land, were then parts of the Watts estate. Hence it was perfectly competent for Mrs. Watts, when she sold to Mrs. Brizendine, to shift the roadway then in use from the tract proposed to be conveyed to the latter to some other portion of her own—that is, Mrs. Watts'—land, and to free the Brizendine tract from this burden. As a matter of fact, it is clear that this is precisely what she did. As noted supra, the map of the Brizendine land, accompanying the deed to the same, indicates an 18-foot road outside of the tract, with the northern outside lines of said tract constituting the southern limits of the road. A third survey filed with the deposition of Robert E. Magee, and herewith reproduced, is a map of a portion of the Brizendine land. This map and the location of the road on same are referred to in the final decree of the court, and the location indicated by the red lines<sup>1</sup> is established by said decree.

At this point the deposition of Magee is reproduced in part:

part survey of that property, and will ask you who made that survey?

"A. I made that survey.

"Q. Does that survey correctly show the present road to the north of that property?

"A. Yes, sir. To the best of my knowledge it does. The red line on the map shows approximately the old road location, and the solid line shows the fence line where it is located now, and where the survey calls for in his deed.

"Q. Was that survey made from his deed, and are the metes and bounds along the road the same as those given in his deed?

Cross-Examination.

"Q. About how long ago was it that you made the first survey for Brizendine of this property?

"A. May 25, 1918. I made the first survey for Brizendine.

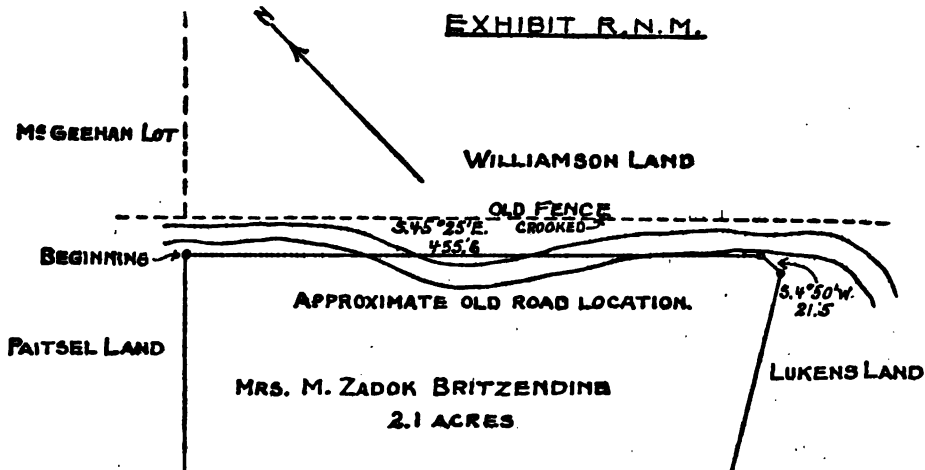

"Q. Did Brizendine tell you at the time why he was having this survey made?

"A. Yes, he did. He wanted to establish his true line, so as to put his fence up by it according to his deed.

"Q. Was the north line of the property that you established the same as the line you recently established?

"A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. Mr. Magee, I show you a copy of a deed from Mrs. Gertrude Watts to Mrs. Brizendine,

Direct Examination.

"Q. Mr. Magee, what is your residence and occupation?

"A. Salem. Occupation, farmer, county surveyor of Roanoke county, Va.

"Q. Do you know the property formerly owned by the Watts estate, and afterwards sold to Mrs. Brizendine?

"A. Yes, sir; I do.

"Q. Consisting of how many acres?

"A. 2.1 acres.

"Q. I here hand you and ask you to file as Exhibit 1, R. E. M., what purports to be a dated February 8, 1906, and acknowledged February 9, 1906, conveying the 2.1-acre tract, and ask you if in the description conveying said tract of land, the south side of an 18-foot road is not called for?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is this 18-foot road mentioned in said deed the same as the old road in question?

"A. I suppose it is. I wish to make this explanation here. In making this survey of mine, there is no known corner on the place to be found, except an iron pin at the corner of the McGeehan lot, and, taking the iron pin at the corner of said lot, as the north side of the 18 foot road, I measured off 18 feet for the road, for the south side of the road, and thence

"Q. Is this McGeehan, Harriet McGeehan?"

"A. I think so. The old pin in the ground that I mentioned is a recognized corner; the said iron pin as shown on the road plat is admitted to be the original corner."

From the third map it appears that the farm road, as it was in use at the time of the sale to Mrs. Brizendine, ran along and within the northern boundary of her tract. Further, if the indicated location is established by a decree of this court, confirming the decree of the trial court, it will be noted that a small strip of land of varying width is left between the northern limit, or boundary, of the road and the Williamson land. The line marked "old fence" is the southern boundary line of the latter tract.

If Mrs. Watts intended to convey to Mrs. Brizendine, and did convey to her, the 2-acre tract, subject to the roadway, as indicated above, then certainly the map accompanying the deed to Mrs. Brizendine was in the highest degree misleading, since it indicates a road entirely outside of the Brizendine tract, with its northern boundary coincident with the Williamson land. Further, if Mrs. Watts intended to grant the Brizendine land subject to a roadway across same, and Mrs. Brizendine was willing to take this land subject to this burden, it is altogether likely that the deed to Mrs. Brizendine would have contained a specific reservation of a right of way for the benefit of the residue of Mrs. Watts' land, like the one noted, supra, in her deed to C. T. Lukens, of date December, 1904.

Having in mind that at the date of the deed to Mrs. Brizendine, Mrs. Watts enjoyed the unquestionable right to shift the location of this roadway without liability to any one, it is not likely that when she disposed of this Brizendine land she would have left as a part of her estate a strip of unsold, and with reference to future use, worthless land, between the roadway and the Williamson land. Nor is it likely that Mrs. Brizendine, buying so small an area as she did, would have been willing to take it subject to a roadway which, with reference to the size of the lot appreciably reduced its available use and value. The deed made by Mrs. Watts with the accompanying map is a clear indication in itself that Mrs. Watts was not selling, and Mrs. Brizendine was not buying, the 2-acre lot, subject to a right of way. Mrs. Brizendine did not need this right of way as an outlet. The turnpike was to the east of her land, and she was entitled, for the purposes of ingress and egress in that direction, to use the roadway across the Lukens land, by virtue of the reservation in Mrs. Watts' deed to Lukens. Mrs. Watts, however, did need an outlet, for, unless she could reach the Lukens tract from the balance of her lands, her reservation of a right of way across that tract was valueless. She could reach the Lukens land either by crossing the Brizendine land, or by utilizing as a road the strip between the Brizendine land and the Williamson land, noted on the Brizendine map. With this choice before her, if she had contemplated the use of the right of way across the Brizendine land, she would doubtless have provided for that right by appropriate reservation in the Brizendine deed, and not indicated a contrary purpose by a misleading map "attached to and made a part of" that deed.

Another indication that Mrs. Watts intended to shift this old road to another location is found in the calls of the deed to Mrs. Brizendine. These calls are made in part with reference to a road, either the road on its old location indicated by the red lines, or a road on the new location indicated by the Brizendine plat. The calls fit the new location, but cannot reasonably be applied to the old. In this connection it will be noted that the old roadway is not referred to in the Watts deeds as a road of definite width. The reservation in the Lukens deed is of "a right of way," not of a road 18 feet wide. Mr. Lukens speaks of this right of way as "an 18-foot right of way reserved," but his deed does not so provide. The first reference in the papers to a road 18 feet wide is in the map accompanying Mrs. Brizendine's deed, referred to supra. The plat accompanying the deed to Harriet McGeehan also indicates an 18-foot road, running between straight lines, not a curved and irregular road, as indicated by the red lines on the Magee exhibit. But the McGeehan deed followed the Brizendine deed, and if Mrs. Watts had shifted the road prior to the conveyance of the Brizendine land, and sold that land free of the burden of a right of way, then she was powerless to impose that burden upon said land in her subsequent conveyance to Mrs. McGeehan, whatever might have been her purpose and intent in that respect.

As a matter of fact, the deed to Harriet McGeehan is in harmony with the indications of the deed to Mrs. Brizendine. Mrs. McGeehan is given a right of egress and ingress merely, "through and over," not the land of Mrs. Brizendine, but the "road lying between said Brizendine and Williamson." The implication of this language is that there was at the time of this deed a road between these two tracts, not a road in large part on the Brizendine tract. The prior map to Mrs. Brizendine indicated such a road, and the map accompanying the deed to Mrs. McGeehan affords a like indication. The deed from H. M. McGeehan to F. A. Paitsel, conveying a portion of her 10-acre purchase, contains the following provision:

"A wagon road is hereby given and granted egress along the said old road above referred to, 18 feet in width, unto the party of the second part."

But Mrs. McGeehan obviously could pass to Paitzel only what she had received from Mrs. Watts. The land sold to said McGeehan is subject to a right of way "for any person owning adjacent lands." Indeed it will be noted that the only deed made by Mrs. Watts that does not subject the land conveyed to a right of way is the deed to Mrs. Brizendine. Recurring now to the calls in the Brizendine deed, as applied to the road therein referred to, we find that the first call is from the corner of the Watts and Lukens land N. 52° 42' E. 144.2 feet to the south side of an 18-foot road (not an old road it will be noted). This call indicates that the line stops at the margin of the road. The next call is "thence N. 4° 15' E. along the road to an angle in the road." As the first call stopped at the southern edge of the road, the second call indicates a straight line coincident with the southern margin of that road to the corner, i. e., the angle in the road. The third call is "thence still along the road N. 46° W. 405.6 feet to a point." The next call leaves the road. These calls fit perfectly with the map filed with the Brizendine deed, indicating an 18-foot road outside and north of the Brizendine land. On the other hand, they cannot be made to fit the road indicated by the red lines. The 18-foot road is indicated in straight, not curving, lines, and if, beginning at the termination of the first call of the deed on the southern margin of a road, it had been intended thereafter to follow the course of a curving road, such intent would have been indicated in the usual language of surveyors, by the words, "thence with the meanders of the road." Moreover, according to the calls of the original map, the terminus of the 405.6 foot line, that is, the corner of the Brizendine line at that point, is on the southern margin of a road. The road indicated by the red lines is slightly above the Brizendine line at its western extremity, and below it towards the middle of the same. This red line road, as heretofore noted, is at no portion of its northern edge, or limit, coincident with the Williamson line, which is the same as the old fence on the Magee map. The evidence is conclusive that Mrs. Watts did not sell the Brizendine land subject to a road, but sold same according to a relocation of this road, which she was fully empowered to make. It appears from the evidence that Mrs. Brizendine allowed the use of the roadway, according to its old location, for some years after her purchase, that is, from February 8, 1906, to some time in the year 1920. But this use was subject to discontinuance at the will and pleasure of the owner of the tract, and no rights superior to the owner's rights were secured by such use. As owner, she had the right to erect a fence along the northern boundary of her land, and to exclude the complainant, Paitzel, and all others from the use of the same.

It is objected that the presence of trees and banks along the Williamson fence, or line, shows that the Watts farm road did not run along there, but did run on the location indicated by the red lines. This is doubtless true, but it is not material.

Paitzel claims through Mrs. McGeehan, and is successor to the right which she derived from Mrs. Watts. This right, as we have noted upon inspection of the McGeehan deed, is the right of "ingress and egress through and over the road lying between Brizendine and Williamson." If this roadway needs to be put in order for travel, that is the concern of Paitzel and others entitled to its use. Difficulties and obstructions in that roadway furnish no ground of right, or foundation of claim, against Mrs. Brizendine. Having forbidden the use of her land for the purposes of egress and ingress by others, the parties affected by that action, but who are entitled to a right of way to the Lukens land, are remitted to the roadway established for their benefit by their grantor.

For the reasons given, the decree of the trial court, establishing the roadway set up in complainant's bill, and directing the defendant, Mrs. M. Z. Brizendine, to remove the obstructions in same, and allow its free use to complainant, must be reversed, and an order dismissing complainant's bill will be entered by this court.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent  $\S$  123(10)—Evidence held sufficient to show that the agent of payee was authorized to accept overdue interest.

In suit to enjoin foreclosure of deed of trust authorizing foreclosure on default in paying interest, evidence held sufficient to show that payee of note authorized her banker to accept overdue interest.

2. Mortgages  $\S$  335—Acceleration clause held valid.

A condition in a deed of trust that, on default in payment of interest the payee of the note secured could cause land to be sold, does not create a penalty or forfeiture against which a court of equity will relieve.

3. Mortgages  $\S$  335—Payee waiving default in paying interest can proceed to foreclose only on giving notice.

Where a payee of a note secured by deed of trust waives a default in paying interest, he cannot again establish his right to foreclose thereunder until he has given due notice of his intentions to the other party.

4. Mortgages  $\Rightarrow$  335—Acceptance of past-due interest is a waiver of right to foreclose for default in payment of interest.

Where the payee of a note secured by deed of trust, providing that on default of interest the debt shall become payable, accepts the past-due interest, he waives the right to enforce the collection of the entire debt for such default.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Culpeper County.

Suit by Oliver Fant against Lucy E. Thomas and others. From decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edwin H. Gibson, of Culpeper, for appellant.

Grimsley & Miller, of Culpeper, for appellees.

SAUNDERS, J. This case presents a single question for determination.

In October, 1918, Oliver Fant, the appellant, purchased a farm in Culpeper county from George T. Grimsley and wife. Prior to that time Grimsley and wife had purchased the same farm from Lucy E. Thomas and others, and, having received the deed therefor, conveyed the same in trust to one Burnett Miller, trustee, to secure two notes of $2,000 and $2,250, respectively, made by George T. Grimsley, payable to and indorsed by Lucinda Grimsley, at the Culpeper National Bank. These notes were for purchase money due on the land aforesaid, and payable five years after date, with interest from date, payable annually. When Fant purchased said land from Grimsley, he assumed the payment of these notes. The deed of trust made by Grimsley and wife contained, among other provisions, the following stipulation:

"Second. If default is made in the payment of any installment of interest on either note herein secured, when due, then that said note will be immediately due and payable, and the trustee can sell under the same conditions as though said note had become due and payable by lapse of time."

Fant did not pay the first annual installment of interest when it fell due on March 8, 1919, but, according to the answer of Mrs. Lucy Thomas, the owner of said notes, the interest was paid and accepted after that date.

From a letter filed by Burnett Miller, trustee, as an exhibit with his answer, it appears that this interest was paid some time after March 14, 1919, the exact date of payment not appearing in the record. The next annual installment of interest became due on March 8, 1920. Fant was again in default in respect of payment, though he had the necessary money to his credit at the bank.

He failed, however, to direct the officers of bank to apply this money to the payment of said interest on the date supra. This interest was not paid until March 18, 1920. The circumstances under which this payment was made will be given in detail hereafter.

Some time after March 8, 1920, the precise date not appearing, Mrs. Thomas requested the trustee, Burnett Miller, to sell the Grimsley land, on the ground that the first note had become due and payable by reason of the failure of Fant to pay the interest on the day when the same fell due. Pursuant to this request, the trustee advertised the land for sale on Saturday, June 12, 1920. Thereupon Fant filed his bill asking for an injunction forbidding said sale, on the ground that Mrs. Thomas had received the interest due on March 8, 1920, and therefore was not entitled to have said land sold. A preliminary injunction was awarded, and Mrs. Thomas and the trustee answered the bill. Mrs. Thomas denied that she had ever received the interest due on the date ubi supra, and asserted that, when she was informed on March 13, 1920, that the sum of $255, the amount of the interest due, had been placed to her credit at the Culpeper National Bank, she declined to accept same, and so notified Mr. Davies, the president of the bank. Further, that she had never accepted said interest, or any part thereof. Certain affidavits, styled respectively "evidence of plaintiff" and "evidence of defendant," were filed by the parties. The affidavits for the plaintiff were the affidavits of John J. Davies, president of the Culpeper National Bank, and R. Weir Waters, cashier of same. The affidavit for the defendant was the affidavit of Mrs. Lucy E. Thomas.

The case came on to be heard in vacation on the pleadings and affidavits, and the court, after stating that "in his opinion, under the trust deed, the principal of the debt secured had become due and payable by reason of the failure to pay the same when due, and the trustee therefore had the right to sell," dissolved the preliminary injunction, and awarded costs against the plaintiff.

[1] The evidence relating to the alleged payment of the interest due on March 8, 1920, is contained in the affidavits of the president and cashier of the Culpeper National Bank, and of the defendant, Mrs. Thomas. The affidavits are conflicting. Mr. Davies states positively that he never received notice from Mrs. Thomas that she would not accept the interest due March 8, 1920, before he received said interest and credited same to her account; that if he had had such notification he would not have accepted payment of the interest from Fant.

His account in detail of the entire transaction is as follows: That on or about March 11, Mrs. Thomas was at the bank inquiring whether the interest then due had been paid by Fant; that he told her that Fant had the necessary funds in bank to meet the interest, but had not given instructions to apply said funds to the payment of the same; that he then told her that he would see Fant and have him pay the interest, and that Mrs. Thomas made no objection to this proposition; that, thinking he was acting with Mrs. Thomas' approval, he called Fant's attention to the matter of interest on March 13, and he immediately paid the interest due, and same was credited to Mrs. Thomas' account on that day; that this payment was made out of money then, and for some days past, to Fant's credit at the bank; that he had never been informed by any one and did not know that Mrs. Thomas had decided not to accept the interest due on March 8, when he received the money from Fant and put same to Mrs. Thomas' credit on March 13, 1920.

The affidavit of Mr. Waters, cashier, is to the effect that he had not given notice to Fant of the day when the interest fell due, and that he had never received notice that Mrs. Thomas would not accept the interest due on March 8, 1920; that Mrs. Thomas was in the bank at various times prior to the 13th day of March, and did not notify him not to accept for her the interest due on the Grimsley notes, which at the time were in the bank for collection and credit to her account; that, so far as he had been able to ascertain, Mrs. Thomas had not notified any of the officials of the bank prior to March 13th not to receive the payment of interest due on March 8th preceding.

The affidavit of Mrs. Thomas is in specific opposition to the foregoing statements. After reciting that the installment of interest due on March 8, 1919, was not paid until some time after it was due, and not until Fant was called upon to pay by her counsel, she proceeds to state that she called at the bank on March 9, 1920, and inquired of Mr. Davies whether her interest had been paid, and was told that Fant had been at the bank after the interest was due, but had not paid the same, or left any instructions for its payment; that she called at the bank on the 11th, and was told by both Mr. Davies and Mr. Waters that nothing had been paid on account of her interest; that on March 13th, after Mr. Davies had been notified that affiant would not accept interest, but was going to claim that the principal of her debt was due by reason of the failure to pay said interest, the sum of $255, the amount of the interest, was placed to her credit at the bank; that she declined to accept this money, and so notified President Davies; that she had never accepted the payment, and did not intend to accept same.

The weight of these affidavits, having in mind that Davies and Waters are disinterested witnesses, is clearly to the effect that Mrs. Thomas accepted Mr. Davies' offer to collect the overdue interest, and that same was collected and put to her credit in conformity with the understanding between these parties. It may be that, after her conversation with Mr. Davies, Mrs. Thomas, upon consultation with others, determined not to accept the overdue interest from Fant, but evidently she did not advise the officials of the bank of that change of attitude. It was while Davies was acting with authority derived from his understanding with Mrs. Thomas that the interest was collected and placed to the latter's credit, thus completing the transaction. What was the legal effect upon Mrs. Thomas' rights of accepting past-due interest from Fant, first in 1919, and second in 1920.

[2] The deed of trust, supra, provides that—

"If default is made in the payment of any installment of interest, on either note herein secured, when due, then that said note will be immediately due and payable, and the trustee can sell under the same conditions as though said note had become due and payable by lapse of time."

Undoubtedly two installments of interest were not paid when due, but were received and receipted for later. This receipt of overdue interest was the voluntary act of the appellee. It was competent for her to stand upon her contract rights, and, upon the failure of the debtor to pay his interest as agreed, to cause the land conveyed to be sold according to the terms of the deed of trust. A contract to the effect that, where there is default in the payment of interest, even for a day, the time of payment of the debt secured is thereby accelerated, and the cestui que trust empowered to enforce deed of trust securing his debt, is a harsh one, and it would seem that equity would have the right to interfere on the ground that the provision accelerating payment is in the nature of a penalty. Such, indeed, was the former attitude of this court (Mayo v. Judah, 5 Munf. 495); but the present law in Virginia touching contracts of the nature, supra, was announced in the accompanying extract from Nickels v. People's Building, Loan & Saving Association, 98 Va. 380, 25 S. E. 8:

"A provision in a contract, not that the amount of the debt shall be increased, but that in a specified event the time for the payment of a certain sum due shall be accelerated, does not create a penalty or forfeiture against which a court of equity will relieve."

The following extract from Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence is cited approvingly in the foregoing connection:

"It is settled, therefore, by the overwhelming weight of authority, that, if a certain sum is due, and secured by a bond, or bond and mortgage, or other form of obligation, and is made payable at some future day specified, with interest thereon made payable during the interval at fixed times annually, or semiannually, or monthly, and a further stipulation provides that, in case default should occur in the prompt payment of any such portion of interest at the time agreed upon, then the entire principal sum of the debt should at once become payable, and payment thereof could be enforced by the creditor, such a stipulation is not in the nature of a penalty, but will be sustained in equity as well as at law." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 439.

But the very section of Pomeroy which announces the foregoing doctrine, proceeds to say:

"The provision for accelerating the time of payment of the whole debt in this manner may, of course, be waived by the creditor, particularly when it is made to depend upon his election."

In support of this proposition Pomeroy cites the English case of Langridge v. Payne, in Johnson and Hemming's Reports, p. 423. This case is singularly in point. The following is from the syllabus of that case:

"Agreement in writing not to call in a mortgage for two years, the mortgagor fulfilling his covenants. On one occasion within the two years, interest was not paid on the day, and the mortgagor shortly thereafter gave notice that he was no longer bound by the agreement, demanded and compelled payment of the interest, and costs of notice."

Having thus collected the past-due interest by force of law, the creditor proceeded to enforce his mortgage. The court held that, upon the facts stated, supra, such collection of the interest was a waiver of default, and an injunction was granted. This creditor not only collected past-due interest, but enforced that collection by resort to the courts, at the same time insisting that he was not bound by the agreement not to call in the mortgage. He stood stoutly upon his rights. Nevertheless the court ruled that the mere collection of the past-due interest to which he was certainly entitled, operated to "waive the default." There was certainly no actual or apparent intent on the part of the mortgagor to waive his rights, but the court treated his acts as a waiver.

[3] "Where a party to a contract waives a default in its terms, he cannot again establish his right to proceed strictly thereunder until he has given due notice of his intentions to the other party." Elliott on Contracts, § 2050.

In the case of Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242, it was held that a provision in a note that, on default of interest, the whole principal should become due, did not cause the statute of limitations to run from that date, but at the expiration of the credit fixed by the note. While the court held in this case that the provision that, on default in payment of interest, the whole amount of principal and interest should become due and payable, was in the nature of a penalty, it further held that, by accepting payment of interest made after the default, the creditor waived all benefit from the default, and thereafter the rights and obligations of both parties continued, without regard to the forfeiture. This case was approved and affirmed in the later case of Mason v. Luce, 118 Cal. 232, 48 Pac. 72.

[4] It is a fair conclusion that when, in the Nickels Case, supra, this court cited Pomeroy as authority for the proposition that a provision in a contract providing that, in a specified event, the time for the payment of a certain sum shall be accelerated, does not create a penalty or forfeiture against which a court of equity will relieve, it approved the companion proposition asserted by Pomeroy in the same section that the provision "for accelerating the time of payment of the whole debt in this manner may, of course, be waived by the creditor." Pomeroy cites the single case of Langridge v. Payne, supra, as sufficient authority to show that this waiver may be affected by the bare receipt of past-due interest, even though the creditor at the time insists that he waives no rights by this acceptance.

See, also, on the subject of waiver by the acts of a party, the recent case of Richmond Leather Co. v. Fawcett, 130 Va. —, 107 S. E. 800, and cases cited.

In view of the principles announced and authorities cited, it is the conclusion of this court that the decree of the circuit court of Culpeper county should be reversed.

THOMPSON et al. v. ARTRIP et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error §173(2)—Objection to notice of termination of lease cannot first be made on appeal.

In unlawful entry and detainer proceedings, the objection that the notice to terminate the lease was defective cannot be urged for the first time on appeal.

2. Landlord and tenant §115(1)—Continuance of possession under supplementary agreement held from month to month.

Where, before the expiration of a two-year lease, the parties made a supplementary agreement to give lessees a month or two after expiration to close out their business, and lessees thereafter paid monthly rent, the tenancy was from month to month.

3. Contracts ¶22(1)—Formal acceptance of offer not necessary.

It is not necessary, in order to make a contract, that a proffer submitted by one party, shall be formally and in terms accepted by the other; an acceptance may be by act.

4. Landlord and tenant ¶114(3)—Presumption of yearly tenancy where tenant for years holds over rebuttable.

The presumption that a tenant for years who holds over after the expiration of his term, with the landlord's permission, is a tenant from year to year, may always be repelled by evidence that the holding over was of another character.

5. Landlord and tenant ¶115(3)—Evidence held to establish tenancy from month to month.

Evidence, that defendants who had been holding under a two-year lease, continued in possession under a supplementary agreement held to establish a tenancy from month to month.

6. New trial ¶71—Verdict on conflicting evidence should not be set aside unless plainly against evidence.

The verdict of a jury, particularly upon conflicting evidence, is entitled to great respect, and should not be set aside unless plainly against the evidence, or without evidence to support it.

7. Landlord and tenant ¶116(7)—Notice of termination held not waived by collecting rent.

Collection of rent to the time at which the lease was terminated held not a waiver of the effect of a notice to terminate the lease, given 30 days prior to the end of the month.

Error to Circuit Court, Russell County.

Action by B. F. Thompson, executor, and others, against N. D. Artrip and another, doing business as the Lewis Creek Mercantile Company. A judgment of dismissal was entered after setting aside a verdict for plaintiffs and granting a new trial, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed and rendered.

A. T. Griffith, of Honaker, for plaintiffs in error.

Bird & Lively, of Lebanon, and G. B. Johnson, of Honaker, for defendants in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is an action of unlawful entry and detainer by B. F. Thompson, executor, and others, to recover from N. D. and Fleet Artrip, doing business under the firm name and style of Lewis Creek Mercantile Company, a certain storehouse and lot in Russell county, Va.

It appears from the record that the plaintiffs secured a verdict against the defendants in the above action. Thereupon a motion was made to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence. The trial court sustained this motion, and awarded a new trial. To this action of the court the plaintiffs excepted. At the next calling of the case, the plaintiffs failing to introduce any evidence, the court entered a final order dismissing the case from the docket. To this judgment of the court a writ of error and supersedeas were awarded by one of the judges of this court.

The property leased to the defendants was the property of the plaintiffs. They were represented in the transaction by B. F. Thompson, and no question is raised as to his authority. The lease was a verbal one, and, according to the testimony of Thompson, was for two years, beginning March 20, 1918, and ending March 20, 1920. The Artrips took possession of the property, paying $9 per month rent therefor. The defense sets up a different contract of leasing, alleging further that the property was rented to N. D. Artrip alone. The monthly rent was collected first by Thompson, and later by C. W. Fuller. B. F. Thompson states that some time in March, 1920, prior to the expiration of the two years lease, Fleet Artrip, who is described by the witness as "the man in actual charge of business at the store," advised him (Thompson) that "they were not going to buy any more goods, and were going to close out, and give the property up. Later, just about the time the lease expired, Fleet Artrip told Thompson that if they would "give them a month, or two, they would close out their goods, and get off the creek." Further, that "he tried to sell the goods back to him," i. e., Thompson.

Proceeding with his testimony, Thompson says:

"They paid us the $9 a month right on up to July 3, 1920, when we had prepared the notice to them to vacate the property. The possession has been withheld from us since September 1, 1920, and since the end of the contract until now, no other contract was ever made with them; they have continued to hold since the end of their contract. The rent has been paid up to that date, September 1, 1920, and up to July 3, since the end of the contract."

On July 26, 1920, the lessors gave notice to the Lewis Creek Mercantile Company as follows:

"You, and each of you, are hereby notified that the undersigned intend to terminate the lease of that certain store building, etc., * * * and which said property you hold as tenant by the month; and that the said termination shall become effective after the expiration of 30 days from the service of this notice as provided by law."

[1] This notice was served on the same day on Fleet Artrip, the return stating that he was in possession of the premises. The sufficiency of this notice is objected to in this court by the appellees, but it does not appear from the record, or from the opinion of the learned judge of the trial court which is before us, that a like objection was made at the trial. This notice is not in the usual form, but we are not prepared to say, though we do not so decide, that it is not substantially sufficient. The summons in unlawful detainer was not issued until September 10, 1920. On September 18, the defendant appeared and pleaded not guilty. The case appears to have been tried upon the merits. Jackson, a constable for the New Garden magisterial district, proved without objection, the notice to terminate the lease, and service thereof on July 6, 1920. Conceding that this notice was defective, objection to same should have been made in the trial court. Not having done this, appellees will not be permitted to urge this objection for the first time in this court.

The case of Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Miller, 80 Va. 821, is one in which a subcontractor sought to give notice, and perfect a mechanic's lien pursuant to the statute. His notice did not conform to the statute, and was not served as required by law, but objection on the ground of these defects was not made at the proper time. This court, passing on the effort to make these objections in the appellate court, said:

"Neither was made in the court below; but both are for the first time raised in the appellate court. If the company desired to rely upon them, it should have brought them to the attention of the circuit court; and, not having done so, clearly it is now too late to raise them here. The object of the notice is to apprise the owner of the subcontractor's claim, and to warn him against making payment to the general contractor. And if the notice be for any reason defective, or if it be not properly served, it is the undoubted privilege of the owner in a suit or action against him by the contractor, to defend on that ground. But these defects or objections he may waive, as in the present case was done by the defendant in not objecting in the circuit court to the introduction in evidence before the jury of a copy of the written notice served by the plaintiff, with the return thereon; and having thus waived them there, the right to insist upon them now is gone." 80 Va. 826.

See, also, cases cited.

"It is a further principle of appellate procedure that an error, to be available on appeal, must have occurred without the express or implied consent of the appellant. A party is held on appeal to the position which he assumed below, and is accordingly estopped to allege error in any action of the trial court which he has recognized as valid by his voluntary acts. Accordingly, when the act assigned as error was done by agreement of the parties, it cannot be availed of on appeal to reverse the judgment, although it is erroneous; so, where a party fails to object below to a proceeding, he is presumed on appeal to waive contention as to its validity." 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. p. 516.

[2] The real question for determination in this case is the precise nature of the contracts between the parties. The plaintiff set up a definite parol lease to expire on March 20, 1920, followed by a supplementary agreement to give the defendants a month or two in which to close out their business. If this latter contract was made, and at its expiration the defendants continued in possession, paying monthly rent, they would be tenants from month to month. The plaintiffs proceeded in their action upon that theory. The balance of March, and the months of April and May, would certainly be a month or two. Thereafter, if rent was paid and received, the tenancy would be from month to month. The defendants deny both the alleged parol lease for two years, and the supplementary lease for a month or two, and set up an entirely different contract. This contention presented a question of fact which the jury decided adversely to the defendants. If credence had been given to the defendants' version of the contract, the verdict would have been in their favor. That the parties realized that an issue of veracity was presented over the conflicting contentions of the parties, and that it was considered that the case would turn upon the resolution of that conflict, is shown by the fact that, after the parties plaintiff and defendant had testified, witnesses were introduced to establish the general reputation for veracity of both the Artrips and B. F. Thompson.

The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiffs, that verdict should have been followed by judgment, unless it was contrary to the evidence, or without evidence to support it.

It appears from the opinion of the trial court that it concluded that—

The "proof showed that the defendants paid rent for, and held possession of, the premises after the two years had expired," and that "no new conditions have arisen since the original lease, in the case at bar, but the same parties have the title, and the defendants hold the same premises for which they have paid the same rent up to a date after the notice was served in the case. The original lease, by the contention of plaintiffs, was for two years."

Concluding, the court said:

"To hold that a tenancy from month to month existed in this case would be plainly against the undisputed contract between the parties, and, therefore, the notice given in the case was not sufficient."

Of course, if the original lease was for two years, and the defendants held over without any new contract, paying rent as formerly, the nature of the subsequent holding would be a tenancy from year to year. But such a view of the evidence ignores the statements to Thompson by Fleet Artrip, immediately prior to the termination of the two-year lease in March, 1920, and the action of the parties thereon.

The first statement of Fleet Artrip, the active manager in charge of the business, was that "they were not going to buy any more goods, and were going to close out, and give the property up." This certainly indicated a purpose on the part of the defendants to surrender the premises at the expiration of the lease. A little later, and just about the time the two years expired, the same Artrip said to Thompson that if "we [i. e., the lessors] would give them a month or two, they would close out their goods, and get off the creek, and he tried to sell the goods back to me." Thompson does not state in terms that he accepted this proposition, but the Artrips continued in possession after this offer on their part, they paying and the plaintiffs receiving $9 a month rent.

If it is considered upon this state of facts that a new contract was made, then a "new condition" arose after the original lease, and the rights of the parties thereafter would be determined with reference to the new contract, and not with reference to the original parol lease for two years.

Apparently the monthly rent was treated as due at the end of each calendar month, the lessors collecting and the lessees paying on that basis. Both the witnesses for the plaintiffs and the defendants state that the rent was paid up to September 1, 1920. N. D. Artrip states that he "paid the rent on the property down to September 1, 1920, and that he has paid the rent on the property in the same way, and in the same amount, ever since he went into possession of the property, down to September 1, 1920." The notice terminating the contract was evidently given with reference to September 1st, for Thompson states that the "possession was withheld from them since September 1, 1920." This notice would not have been sufficient if the defendants had held over under the original two-year lease, paying the agreed rental, for the tenancy in such case would be from year to year. But if the jury was justified in concluding that the request of the defendants, submitted by Fleet Artrip to the plaintiffs, and the subsequent action thereon of the parties, constituted a new contract of lease, then this notice would be sufficient. The holding over, in that event, and payment of monthly rent, would create a tenancy from month to month.

"At any time before the expiration of a lease, the parties may agree as to what shall be the nature of the tenants' holding over." Blumberg v. Myres, 32 Cal. 93, 91 Am. Dec. 560.

[3] Furthermore, it is not necessary, in order to make a contract, that a proffer submitted by one party shall be formally and in terms accepted by the other. Certainly all that passed between the parties prior to the expiration of the lease, as well as their subsequent action thereon, was matter proper for the consideration of the jury for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the subsequent holding.

"An acceptance of an offer may be by act, as where an offer is made that the offerer will pay, or do something else, if the offeree should do a particular thing. In such a case performance is the only thing needful to complete the agreement, and create a binding promise." 13 Corpus Juris, 275, § 73, and cases cited.

Acceptance may be inferred from the acts and conduct of the promisee. Colgin v. Henley, 6 Leigh (33 Va.) 85, 86, 104, 105.

It was competent for the jury, under their well-recognized powers, to pass on and determine the credibility of the witnesses, and to conclude from the evidence of Thompson and the action of the parties that prior to March 20, 1920, the Artrips did submit a proposition which was acceded to by the plaintiffs, and which determined the character of the future holding of the premises in question.

[4] The presumption that a tenant for years who holds over after the expiration of his term, with the permission of the landlord, is a tenant from year to year, may always be repelled by evidence showing that such holding over is in another character, or for some other purpose than that of tenant from year to year.

In the instant case this presumption is repelled by evidence of a new contract, to which credence was given by the jury, as shown by their verdict for the plaintiffs.

[5, 6] It was manifest error to set aside this verdict in view of the evidence tending to establish a supplementary agreement between the parties, thereby introducing a new condition, and repelling the implication that would have followed from a mere holding over by the lessees, and payment of monthly rent at the expiration of the two years' lease. The verdict of a jury, particularly upon conflicting evidence, is always entitled to great respect, and should not be set aside, unless, as stated supra, it is plainly against the evidence, or without evidence to support it.

The defense contends that there was no partnership between the Artrips, that none was alleged, and none proved. The summons in unlawful detainer is against N. D. and Fleet Artrip, trading as the Lewis Creek Mercantile Company, and the notice to terminate the lease is against the same concern. After these notices were given, the defendants appeared, pleaded not guilty, and issue was joined. There was no affidavit denying partnership under section 6127, Code of Virginia. All conflicts between the testimony of the plaintiffs and defendants were settled by the verdict of the jury.

[7] A further contention of the defendants

Is that by receiving rent to September 1, 1920, the plaintiffs waived the effect of their notice to terminate the lease. The notice to terminate the lease related to the month ending August 31, 1920. It could not relate to the month ending July 31st, for the manifest reason that it was given and served during that month. The Code provides that a tenancy from month to month may be terminated by a 30 days' notice in writing prior to the end of the month. The month in this case was August, 1920, and the plaintiffs were entitled to collect their rent to the time at which the lease was terminated. Hence, collection to that date involved no waiver of rights.

For the reasons heretofore stated, the judgment complained of will be reversed, and a judgment will be entered conforming to the verdict of the jury, and awarding the possession of the premises in controversy to the plaintiffs.

Reversed.

CLINCHFIELD COAL CORPORATION
v. HAYTER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Trespass. ¶46(1)—Verdict for plaintiff for injury to trees sustained by evidence.

In an action by a landowner for cutting and branding trees, injuring them, a verdict for plaintiff held supported by evidence.

2. Appeal and error ¶361(3)—That petition in error complained of a certain, instead of a final, judgment immaterial.

That a petition in error complained of a "certain" judgment, instead of a final judgment, did not constitute ground for dismissal, where the only judgment entered was a final one.

3. Appeal and error ¶1170(3)—Failure to furnish bill of particulars when ordered not ground for reversal.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's trees, that plaintiff failed to furnish a bill of particulars at the time called for by the order was not ground for reversal, when defendant was not taken by surprise, and in view of Code 1919, § 6331.

4. Evidence ¶358—Correct maps admissible regardless of source.

Where maps and drawings introduced by plaintiff in an action for injury to trees were in fact correct representations of the locus in quo, they were admissible regardless of the source from which plaintiff derived the information upon which they were based.

5. Evidence ¶379—How correctness of maps may be shown.

It is not necessary that the correctness of a map or drawing should be shown by the person who made it; the fact may be shown by any competent witness who knows it.

6. Trespass ¶46(2)—Showing of title held sufficient.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff's trees, plaintiff's showing of common title in the immediate grantors of plaintiff and defendant, respectively, and that plaintiff's deed, duly recorded, was prior in time to defendant's, held a sufficient showing of true title in plaintiff to entitle him to recover.

7. Damages ¶62(1)—When duty to minimize damages arises stated.

The duty to minimize consequential damages from a wrongful act of defendant is not arbitrarily imposed in all cases, but only where it is a reasonable duty, and can be performed at trifling expense or with reasonable exertion, and there is no such duty where the injured party is not chargeable with notice that consequential damages are likely to ensue.

8. Damages ¶62(3)—Owner of injured trees held not bound to hasten their sale to minimize damages.

Where plaintiff's trees had been injured by defendant's wrongful acts in branding them, plaintiff was not bound to hasten their sale to minimize damages where he did not know that consequential damages would arise; defendant having assured him that the branding would do no harm.

9. Trespass ¶2—Branding trees by mistake trespass warranting damages.

Where defendant admitted branding plaintiff's trees by mistake, such evidence alone entitled plaintiff to judgment for some amount, as it was a trespass on plaintiff's land.

10. Appeal and error ¶1004(2)—Recovery for injury to trees held not excessive.

Where there was conflict in the evidence, a recovery of $400 for cutting 18 trees and branding 135 so that some of them died could not be held excessive by the Supreme Court of Appeals.

Error to Circuit Court, Russell County.

Action by one Hayter against the Clinchfield Coal Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Morison, Morison & Robertson, of Bristol, Burns & Kidd, of Lebanon, and John W. Flannagan, Jr., of Clintwood, for plaintiff.

M. M. Long, of St. Paul, and S. H. & Geo. C. Sutherland, of Clintwood, for defendant.

BURKS, J. [1] The plaintiff (Hayter) claims that the defendant cut and removed from the former's land 18 trees and branded 135 trees, seriously injuring them. The defendant admitted branding the 135 trees on plaintiff's land, but denied that any injury resulted from the branding, and also denied that any trees were cut on the plaintiff's land. There was a sharp conflict between the evidence for the plaintiff and that for the defendant on the matters denied by the defendant. There was also a sharp conflict between the testimony for the two parties as to the value of the trees alleged to have been cut. The plaintiff and one or more of his witnesses testified that the trees cut were worth $10 apiece. The testimony for the defendant was that these trees were not worth more than from $1.20 to $1.50 apiece. The testimony for the plaintiff was to the effect that the trees had been seriously injured by the branding, and that at least eight of them had died prior to the institution of this action. The testimony for the defendant was to the effect that the branding did the trees no harm, and that they were worth just as much after the branding as before. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff and assessed his damages at $400. There was a motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence, which the trial court overruled, and entered up judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the verdict. While the decided preponderance of the evidence appears from the record to be with the defendant as to the damages sustained by the plaintiff, it is plain from the above statement of facts that this court cannot interfere with the verdict and judgment of the trial court. It was the province of the jury to weigh the evidence on these subjects, and under the circumstances it cannot be said that the verdict was without evidence to sustain it, or is so plainly contrary to the evidence that this court ought to interfere. W. S. Forbes & Co. v. Southern Cotton Oil Co., 130 Va. —, 108 S. E. 15.

[2] A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the petition did not show that the judgment complained of was a final judgment. The petition speaks of the judgment complained of as a certain judgment rendered by the circuit court of Russell county at its September term, 1919, for $400 in favor of C. M. Hayter against the petitioner. The ground of the motion appears to be that the petitioner speaks of the judgment as a certain judgment instead of a final judgment. Turning to the record, we find that the only judgment entered by the court at that time in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant was in fact a final judgment. The motion to dismiss is wholly without merit.

[3] The first error assigned by the plaintiff in error is the action of the trial court in allowing the plaintiff to file a bill of particulars at the time at which it was filed. On motion of the defendant the plaintiff was required to file a bill of particulars by an order made December 19, 1916. It was a proper case to have required a bill of particulars, and the order of the court was not complied with. At the September term, 1919, both parties announced themselves ready for trial, and the trial was begun. Nothing was said at that time about the failure to file the bill of particulars, but, after the plaintiff had gone on the stand and had testified at some length in his own behalf, he offered in evidence on his own behalf several letters written him by the local land agent of the defendant with reference to the controversy, in one of which it was admitted that the defendant had branded 135 white oak trees on the plaintiff's land, but denied that the branding had done the timber any harm, and also denied that any trees had been cut on the plaintiff's land by the defendant. At this stage the defendant objected to any testimony "with reference to damage alleged to have been suffered by reason of the branding of said 135 trees because no bill of particulars had been filed, and that the defendant could not at that date prepare its defense to the issues raised by the bill of particulars if it were permitted to be filed." No motion was made to postpone the hearing or to continue the case. Looking at the case retrospectively, it seems plain that the defendant was not taken by surprise, and that he was full-handed with proof on the items of controversy set forth in the bill of particulars. It had its witnesses present to testify as to the boundaries of the land, and a number of witnesses to testify as to the value of the trees cut and removed and the injury to the 135 trees that were branded, and there is no suggestion now that any injury resulted to the defendant from allowing the plaintiff to file the bill of particulars at the time at which it was filed. The sole ground of complaint is that the statute permitting the defendant to call for a bill of particulars was not complied with. We are satisfied from the record that the defendant was not, and could not have been, injured by permitting the bill of particulars to be filed at the time at which it was filed. It is said in the brief for the defendant in error that the bill of particulars had in fact been filed long before and was found among the papers in the case, but there is no evidence of this fact in the record. The bill should have been filed in accordance with the order of the court, but when it was found that the orders did not show the filing it was necessary for the trial court to determine what should be done. Some discretion must be left to the trial courts in matters of this kind, and where, as here, it can be seen from the record that no injury could have resulted to the defendant from the failure to file the bill of particulars earlier, this court will not set aside its ruling. We are not unmindful of former rulings of this court on the subject of bills of particulars, a number of which are referred to in Burks' Pleading & Practice, § 318, and Colby v. Ream, 109 Va. 308, 63 S. E. 1009, referred to by the plaintiff in error, but the facts of this case are easily distinguish-able from prior cases. Furthermore, we are satisfied that the plaintiff in error is not entitled to a reversal on this point in view of the provisions of section 6331 of the Code.

The second assignment of error is to the action of the trial court in admitting in evidence a certain plat and blueprint and certain drawing over the objection of the defendant, and in overruling the defendant's motion to strike the same from the evidence. Plaintiff and defendant claimed under a common grantor but the plaintiff held the older deed and hence the superior title to the land within his boundaries, but there was a dispute between them as to the true location of the beginning corner of the plaintiff's title and the next succeeding corner, and the plaintiff also claimed that the defendant had ignored some of the calls of his deed at another point, and had thereby cut off a triangle of his land upon which were 15 of the trees which had been cut and removed by the defendant. In order to give the jury a clearer view of the situation and of the location of the calls in his deed, the plaintiff, while testifying in his own behalf, produced and offered in evidence a plat and blueprint and certain drawings of his tract and proceeded to point out thereon the location of the beginning point and other disputed calls of the deed under which he claimed title, which deeds had been previously introduced in evidence. The defendant strenuously objected to the reception in evidence of the plat and blueprint and the drawings on the ground that their correctness had not been established, but the court overruled the objection and admitted them, and this ruling is assigned as error.

[4] The plat and blueprint had been made by a surveyor, Thacker, in 1910, three years before the present controversy arose. Thacker was not examined as a witness in the case, but the plaintiff testifies that the map was correct "according to the records" and he thought was correct, though he admitted on cross-examination that he did not see Thacker make the map, was not present when he located the lines on the map, he was not a surveyor, and did not know how to use a compass. As to his own drawings the plaintiff further testified that he made the drawings aforesaid, and copied them from the Thacker map, and time and again testified that his drawings were correct (although he did not run the lines nor locate them with a compass) and truly represented the location of the points in dispute. With his own title deeds before him and also the deed under which the defendant claims, and reading the calls of his deeds, he pointed out the location on the drawings of each of the disputed calls and also of the triangle cut off by the omission of certain calls in his deed. The drawings made by himself enabled him to give a more graphic description of the disputed points than he could have done by mere oral statements. There is no dispute about the fact that the plaintiff made the drawings himself and testified as to their correctness. If they were in fact correct representations of the locus in quo, it is immaterial from what source the plaintiff derived his information upon which they were based, and they were properly received in evidence; and if the drawings were mere tracings of the Thacker map and were properly received in evidence, the defendant could not have been injured by admitting in evidence the Thacker map and blueprint, even if not otherwise shown to be correct. If the drawings were correct representations of the locus in quo, the map was necessarily so.

[5] It is not necessary that the correctness of a map or drawing should be shown by the person who made it. That fact may be shown by any competent witness who knows it. The map or drawing does not prove itself by mere production, but any witness who knows the object represented may testify that the map or drawing correctly represents his idea of such object, and when he has so testified the map or drawing may be received in evidence. Witnesses often make drawings while testifying to illustrate the relative location of objects, and this is always permissible. It is simply the testimony of the witness in graphic form. 1 Greenl. Ev. (16th Ed.) §§ 439d, 439g, 439h; 17 Cyc. 412, and cases cited.

[6-8] The next error assigned is the action of the trial court in giving certain instructions of its own motion. The court gave several instructions at the instance of the plaintiff and of the defendant, respectively, and also four instructions of its own motion. The latter we have examined carefully, and think that they are free from the objections alleged. The plaintiff in error objects to those instructions on one or the other of two grounds. It is said that one of the instructions allowed the plaintiff to recover if his deeds covered the land on which the trees cut or injured stood, and did not require the plaintiff to show true title to the land. The plaintiff showed a common title in the immediate grantors of the plaintiff and defendant, respectively, and that the plaintiff's deed, which was duly recorded, was prior in point of time to that of the defendant. This was a sufficient showing of true title in the plaintiff to entitle him to recover. The objection made to three of the instructions given by the court of its own motion involves the subject of the duty of an injured party to minimize the consequential damages resulting from the tort of another. This question of the duty of the plaintiff to minimize his damages is raised in several of the assignments of error, and will be finally disposed of here. In brief, the contention of the defendant is that it was the duty of the plaintiff to sell his trees which had been branded soon after they were branded and before the worms got into them and injured them, and if he did not promptly put them on the market, and the damage resulted from such failure and delay, he could not recover. It is unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of when it is necessary for a plaintiff to minimize his consequential damages resulting from the wrongful act of a defendant. The duty is not arbitrarily imposed on the injured party in all cases, but only where it is a reasonable duty, and can be performed at trifling expense, or with reasonable exertion. Stonega Coal Co. v. Addington, 112 Va. 807, 73 S. E. 257, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 969. But there can be no such duty where the injured party does not know and is not chargeable with notice that consequential damages are likely to ensue from the wrongful act. Hayter had no knowledge of the effect of branding trees, and was assured by the defendant shortly after the branding that the branding would not hurt them, and at the trial produced a number of witnesses who testified on its behalf that branding would not injuriously affect trees, and in this case had not done so. Under such circumstances it could not have been the duty of Hayter to hasten the sale of his trees, in order to avoid a damage which was not to be anticipated, even if such duty were imposed under other circumstances.

It is assigned as error that the court modified two of the instructions offered by the defendant and refused to give them except as modified. The error, if any, is not pointed out; but, even if adequately assigned, no error was committed in making the change. The modification was slight and simply applied the instructions to the evidence in the case. The refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions tendered by the defendant relating to the duty of the plaintiff to minimize his damages constitutes the sixth assignment of error. This has already been sufficiently dealt with.

[9, 10] The seventh assignment of error is that the trial court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict because excessive and also contrary to the law and the evidence. The defendant admitted branding 135 trees on the plaintiff's land by mistake. This alone entitled the plaintiff to a judgment for some amount, as it was a trespass on the plaintiff's land. 26 R. C. L. p. 762, § 10. There was conflict as to the amount of the resulting damages. There was also conflict as to the value of the trees cut and removed. As the case appears in cold print, we could not, if on the jury, have found so large an amount, but this court cannot discredit the statements of the witnesses as to the value which the jury have believed. The credibility of the witnesses was a question for the jury, and with its finding we cannot interfere.

The judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

1. Convicts § 3—Statute for appointment of committee of convict's estate construed.

Under Code 1919, § 4998, in order to appoint a committee for the estate of a convict, the person must have been convicted of a felony and sentenced to the penitentiary, or to the state convict road force for one year or more, and must possess some estate, real or personal, some portion of which must be within the territory of the court making the commitment, and the motion must be made by an interested party, and on the existence of any of these grounds being challenged, evidence of the existence of the grounds must be furnished.

2. Convicts § 3—Where no evidence was presented on issues concerning the right to appoint a committee for a convict's estate, the appointment was illegal.

Where the appointment of a committee for the estate of a convict was resisted on the grounds that he had no estate, and that the person moving for the appointment had no interest in committing his estate, the bill of exceptions, reciting that no evidence was offered either by the movant or the defendant, shows the appointment of a committee was erroneous.

Error to Circuit Court, Scott County.

Proceedings by Bettie Redwine, administrator of S. L. Redwine, deceased, against T. O. Gilmer. From judgment appointing a committee for the estate of said Gilmer, as a convict, he brings error. Reversed.

O. M. Vicars, of Wise, and S. H. Bond and W. H. Nickels, both of Gate City, for plaintiff in error.

W. S. Cox and J. P. Corns, both of Gate City, and Coleman & Carter, of Big Stone Gap, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Scott county, pronounced at its May term, 1920. This judgment, in part, is as follows:

" * * * For motion of Mrs. Bettie Redwine, administratrix of S. L. Redwine, deceased, for the appointment of a committee for T. O. Gilmer, who has been convicted of a felony, and sentenced to the penitentiary, the court doth appoint C. W. Dougherty as said committee, it appearing that the notice has been given according to law, and the said T. O. Gilmer appearing in court, the court selected the said Dougherty as his committee."

T. O. Gilmer objected to the appointment of a committee on several grounds which were overruled by the court. To this action of the court the said Gilmer excepted. His bill of exception is reproduced, in part, as follows:

"Whereupon the said Gilmer was brought into court, and by counsel objected to the appointment of a committee for him, on the following grounds:

"First. Bettie Redwine had no interest in the matter of an appointment for him.

"Second. He had no estate for which to appoint a committee.

"Third. He had not had sufficient notice of said motion. But the court overruled his said objections, and appointed C. W. Dougherty committee for the said T. O. Gilmer, over the protest of the said T. O. Gilmer, no evidence having been offered by either party. To which action of the court in appointing said committee, the said T. O. Gilmer excepted, and prays that his bill of exceptions be signed," etc.

[1] The party making the motion relies upon section 4998, Code of Virginia, which provides that—

"When a person is convicted of a felony and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary or to the state convict road force for one year or more his estate, both real and personal, if any he has, shall, on motion of any party interested, be committed by the circuit or corporation court of the county or city in which his estate, or some part thereof is, to a person selected by the court, who after giving bond," etc.

Four things are necessary to furnish authority to a court to commit an estate under this section:

I. The person whose estate is proposed to be committed must have been convicted of felony and sentenced to the penitentiary, or to the state convict road force, for one year, or more.

II. There must be some estate, real or personal, belonging to the convict.

III. The motion must be made by an interested party.

IV. The estate, or some portion of it, must be within the territory of the court making the commitment.

It is manifest that if a motion under the section, supra, is resisted in the trial court, and the existence of any one, or more, of these grounds of jurisdiction is challenged, evidence that the grounds so challenged do exist must be furnished.

[2] In the instant case, Gilmer objected: First, that Bettie E. Redwine had no interest in committing his estate to a person of the court's selection; second, that he had no estate to be committed. This court is unable to presume that in response to these objections evidence was taken, and the grounds of jurisdiction established, for the obvious reason that the bill of exceptions recites that no "evidence was offered," either by the mov-ant. Bettie E. Redwine, or by the plaintiff in error. So far as appears from the record, Bettie E. Redwine had no interest whatever in the appointment of a committee for Gilmer, and the latter had no estate to be committed. As these facts were in issue, they should have been affirmatively established, in order to support the jurisdiction of the trial court, and sustain the action of which complaint is made.

The objections of the plaintiff in error were taken in time, and saved by proper bill of exceptions.

For the reasons given, it is considered that in the situation presented, the trial court erred in committing the estate of T. O. Gilmer to C. W. Dougherty, and its order in this respect must be reversed.

Reversed.

CHARLES v. McCLANAHAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

1. Deeds $\S$ 94—Prior stipulations are merged in the deed.

In the absence of fraud or mistake in the instrument itself, prior stipulations and understandings are merged in the final and formal deed executed by the parties.

2. Reformation of Instruments $\S$ 17(1) — Grantee held not entitled to have mineral reservation stricken from deed.

Where a deed expressly reserved one-half of the minerals, the grantee, accepting the deed with knowledge of the reservation, was not entitled to have the deed reformed by striking the reservation on the theory that the grantor intended to sell and he intended to buy the entire interest of the grantor in the land.

3. Reformation of Instruments $\S$ 17(1) — Grantor not entitled to reformation of deed reserving one-half of the minerals so as to reserve all.

Where grantor reserved one-half the minerals under the mistaken belief that he owned one-half only, he was not entitled to reform the deed; the reservation as made representing the agreement of the parties when made.

4. Quietting title $\S$ 7(2)—Grantee's deed omitting mineral reservation held cloud on grantor's title.

Where land was conveyed by deed reserving one-half the minerals, and the grantee in turn conveyed by deed without reservation, such deed constituted a cloud on the title of the original grantor which he was entitled to have removed.

5. Reformation of Instruments —32—Failure to assert incorrectness of deed for 17 years a waiver.

Where a grantee accepted a deed reserving mineral rights as a full performance of the contract to convey and made no claim for 17 years, that the reservation should not have been included, he must be held to have waived his rights.

Sims, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County.

Suit by Green Charles against George W. McClanahan and others, with cross-bill by defendant named. From the decree plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

W. A. Daugherty, of Grundy, for appellant.

Williams & Combs, of Grundy, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. On September 5, 1901, Green Charles and wife and D. M. Charles and wife conveyed a certain tract of land to George W. McClanahan. So much of the granting clause as is necessary to recite reads thus:

"The said parties of the first part do grant, bargain, and sell unto the said George W. McClanahan all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in Buchanan county, Va. [here follows a proper description of the land], containing 20 acres, the same more or less. (One-half of the mineral is excepted from this conveyance.)"

Then follows a covenant of special warranty, with the usual Virginia statutory covenants of title.

On June 21, 1910, D. M. Charles and wife conveyed to Green Charles all of their undivided interest in a large tract of land, excepting therefrom the 20 acres which had been conveyed to George W. McClanahan, and including therein all coal and other mineral which had been excepted from the McClanahan deed and in four other conveyances, fully identified. Then on July 16, 1918, McClanahan and wife conveyed to their son, Wilson McClanahan, the 20 acres of land which had been thus conveyed to him in 1901, without making any reservation of the mineral rights. Thereafter, in May, 1920, Green Charles instituted this suit. Its objects were: (a) The correction and reformation of the deed from Green Charles and D. M. Charles to George W. McClanahan of September 5, 1901; and (b) the vacation and annulment of the deed from George W. McClanahan and wife to Wilson McClanahan of July 16, 1918, in so far as it purports to convey one-half of the coal and minerals underlying the 20 acres of land thereby conveyed upon the ground that this deed constitutes a cloud upon the complainant's title to such one-half of such coal minerals.

The pertinent facts as to the original conveyance from Charles to McClanahan are that at the time the grantors did not think that they owned but half of the coal and mineral underlying the tract (though Green Charles denies this). The claim on the part of McClanahan is that it was his purpose to buy and the intention of the grantors to convey their entire interest in the land; and he filed an answer which he asked to be read as a cross-bill, praying that his deed be reformed so as to carry out this intention.

It is manifest, however, that even if the grantors were mistaken in thinking that they did not own all of the minerals, it is nevertheless true, and is clear from the testimony, that when they came to execute the deed, it was explicitly and distinctly understood that the title to one-half of the minerals thereunder was not to be conveyed. There was no mistake of the draftsman in drawing the deed, nor was there any mistake or misunderstanding between the parties as to the property which the deed conveyed and as to the estate in the minerals therein which were reserved. The precise form of the deed grew out of the ignorance of both the grantors and the grantee as to the true estate which the grantors owned prior to the conveyance.

[1] We must first determine, then, in this case, the true effect and proper construction to be put upon the original conveyance of 20 acres here involved. McClanahan claims that it was the previous understanding that he was to have the entire estate therein which the grantors owned. In the absence of fraud or mistake in the instrument itself, the rule is universal, applicable to deeds as well as to all other contracts, that prior stipulations and understandings are merged in the final and formal contract executed by the parties, and when a deed has been delivered and accepted as performance of an antecedent contract to convey, the contract is merged in the deed.

In Slocum v. Bracy, 55 Minn. 249, 56 N. W. 826, 43 Am. St. Rep. 499, it is said that—"No rule of law is better settled than that, where a deed has been executed and accepted as performance of an executory contract to convey real estate, the contract is functus officio, and the rights of the parties rest thereafter solely on the deed."

The question has been considered very recently by this court in two cases. In Charles v. Charles, 127 Va. 610, 104 S. E. 825, in which it was held that there was no reservation of title to certain minerals claimed by the grantor because the language relied upon there, which was in the clause relating to covenants, was insufficient to create such a reservation. It followed, therefore, that the grantee took the entire estate of the grantors under the express language of the deed in the granting clause. This is said:

"When parties reduce their contracts or agreements to writing, acknowledge them before an officer, and cause or permit them to be spread upon the public records, in the absence of any evidence of fraud, there is a very strong presumption that they correctly set forth the understanding and agreement of the parties thereto. Courts of equity will not lightly set them aside."

And the doctrine is there stated to be that, in order to justify a court of equity in undertaking to correct a deed which the parties have accepted, the evidence must be clear, convincing, and satisfactory, and the pertinent cases are there cited.

In Woodson v. Smith and Johnson, 128 Va. 652, 104 S. E. 794, this is said:

"Doubtless many cases may arise in which distinct and unperformed stipulations contained in a contract for sale will not be merged in or discharged by deed where that instrument is silent upon the subject of such stipulations. In such cases there is no conflict between the contract and the deed. But the deed must be regarded as the sole and final expression of the agreement between the parties as to every subject which it undertakes to deal with. All inconsistencies between the prior contract and the deed must be determined by the latter alone, and previous negotiations or agreements, verbal or written, cannot be set up for the purpose of contradicting it. The application of these principles may result in occasional hardship and occasional failure to carry out the real intention of the parties; but the principles themselves are safe and sound, they have been shown by experience to promote justice and fair dealing in the average case, and they are, for these reasons, abundantly supported by authority"—citing Portsmouth Refining Co. v. Oliver Refining Co., 109 Va. 513, 64 S. E. 56, 132 Am. St. Rep. 924; Stephen Putney S. Co. v. R. F. & P. R. Co., 116 Va. 211, 81 S. E. 98; 2 Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) § 850a; 13 Cyc. 616; 8 Ruling Case Law, p. 1048, § 102; note to Clifton v. Jackson Co., 16 Am. St. Rep. 622.

[2] Applying this undoubted rule to the facts of this case, it seems to us perfectly clear that the prayer of the cross-bill is without merit, and that McClanahan, the grantee under the original deed, acquired no interest in the one-half of the minerals underlying the tract which is the subject of this controversy, because the title thereto is expressly reserved, and hence he is not entitled to have his deed reformed by striking out the exception from the grant, of which he had full knowledge before the delivery of the deed, and which he accepted as full and final performance of the contract.

The trial court dismissed the complainant's bill upon the ground, to use the language of the decree, "that the equities are with the defendants"; that is, the decree refused to grant the prayer of the bill for the correction and reformation which was prayed for by the complainant, Charles, and also denied his prayer as to so much of the deed from George W. McClanahan to his son, Wilson McClanahan, of July 16, 1918, as purports to convey the one-half of the coal and minerals underlying the tract which had been excepted from his conveyance, because it constituted a cloud upon his (Charles) title.

[3] We think that the court correctly denied the prayer of the bill for the reformation and correction of the original deed, because the deed expressed sufficiently the true and final agreement of the parties, and needs no correction or reformation. It expressly excepts from the operation of the conveyance one-half of the minerals. As this expressed the understanding of the parties when the instrument was delivered, the complainant is not entitled to any such relief. The language may possibly need construction, though its meaning to us seems clear. The evidence shows that the only mineral which can be profitably mined in that locality is coal, and that in reserving the minerals the parties had coal in mind. The language, however, is comprehensive and includes one-half of all mineral substances which may underlie the property which may profitably be mined without impairing the rights of the owner of the surface.

The complainant also alleged that the deed of July 16, 1918, from George W. McClanahan and wife to their son, Wilson McClanahan, constituted a cloud upon his title, because it undertook to convey the entire tract without the reservation of the half of the minerals which the complainant owned, and the court refused to grant this relief.

[4] We are of opinion that this constitutes harmful error, and that this relief should have been granted. Under our construction of the original deed to McClanahan, he has no title to the half of the minerals which was reserved, and it appears from this record that the complainant, Green Charles, is now the sole owner of the estate which was thus reserved. The deed from George W. McClanahan and wife to Wilson McClanahan does, therefore, constitute a cloud upon his title, which he is entitled to have removed.

The equitable doctrines referred to in the dissenting opinion are not controverted. We cannot, however, apply them to the facts appearing in this record; for we find no evidence of fraud on the part of the appellant Charles. He testifies that at the time of the original contract the reservation of the minerals was made, saying with reference thereto that he told McClanahan "in the beginning that we would except one-half of it." and that he "also told him when we made the deed that we would except one-half of it." This version of the original contract is strikingly confirmed by the testimony of Mc-

Clanahan himself, for in his cross-examination this question and answer appear:

"Q. Then at the time you bought and at the time you accepted this deed, you bought the surface and one-half of the coal and mineral underlying this tract, didn't you?

"A. That is what I bought."

[5] If McClanahan had the rights under the original agreement which he now claims, he could have refused the deed which was tendered and either recovered the purchase money, $25, or enforced his rights in a suit for specific performance. As he did neither, but accepted the deed as a satisfactory performance of the contract of sale, and made no such claim for 17 years thereafter, he must be held to have waived every claim which is inconsistent with its provisions.

Our conclusion, therefore, is to reverse the decree of the trial court and enter a decree here canceling, vacating, and annulling the deed from George W. McClanahan and Jemima McClanahan, his wife, to Wilson McClanahan, dated July 16, 1918, in so far as that deed purports to convey one-half of the coal and minerals underlying the 20 acres of land embraced in and conveyed by that deed, and removing the cloud thereby created upon the appellant's title to one-half of the coal and minerals underlying the tract.

BURKS, J., absent.

SIMS, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in two of the holdings of the majority opinion, namely: (a) That the defendant George W. McClanahan is not entitled to have the deed to him from Green Charles and D. M. Charles, of date September 5, 1901, reformed, as prayed for in the answer of such defendant, by striking therefrom the clause therein which is as follows, to wit: "(One-half of the mineral is excepted from this conveyance)"—so as to make the deed conform in its subject-matter with the contract of purchase which was entered into between said defendant and such grantors prior to the execution and delivery of the deed; and (b) that the deed from such defendant and wife to their son, Wilson McClanahan, of date July 16, 1918, should be canceled, vacated, and annulled in so far as it purports to convey one-half of the coal and minerals underlying the land conveyed by such deed.

The correctness of both of these holdings depends upon the correctness of the holding first mentioned.

As I understand the opinion, it does not affirmatively decide whether the evidence does or does not establish that the contract of purchase differed from the deed in that the contract of purchase contained no reservation of any mineral interest, whereas the deed did contain the reservation aforesaid, nor does the opinion affirmatively decide whether such reservation in the deed was or was not occasioned by the mutual mistake of both the grantors and the said defendant grantee in thinking at the time the deed was executed and delivered that the grantors owned only a half interest in the minerals (meaning coal and other minerals) underlying the land, or by such mistake on the part of the grantee, induced by the fraudulent representation of the grantors. But the opinion takes the following position, namely (I quote from the opinion):

"* * * That even if the grantors were mistaken in thinking that they did not own all of the minerals, it is nevertheless true, and is clear from the testimony, that when they came to execute the deed, it was explicitly and distinctly understood that the title to one-half of the minerals thereunder was not to be conveyed. There was no mistake of the draftsman in drawing the deed, nor was there any mistake or misunderstanding as to the property which the deed conveyed and as to the estate in the minerals therein which were reserved. The precise form of the deed grew out of the ignorance of both the grantors and the grantee as to the true estate which the grantors owned prior to the conveyance.

"We must first determine, then, in this case, the true effect and proper construction to put upon the original conveyance of the 20 acres here involved. McClanahan claims that it was the previous understanding that he was to have the entire estate therein which the grantors owned. In the absence of fraud or mistake in the instrument itself the rule is universal, applicable to deeds as well as to all other contracts, that prior stipulations and understandings are merged in the final and formal contract executed by the parties, and when a deed has been delivered and accepted as performance of an antecedent contract to convey, the contract is merged in the deed."

Then follows the citation of a number of cases to sustain such position.

This position, as I understand it, is this: If it be assumed that the contract of purchase was of the land and all mineral interests, and that, when the deed came to be made subsequently, the clause reserving one-half of the mineral interest, which is at variance with the contract of purchase, was inserted in it solely because of the mutual mistake of the grantors and grantee in thinking at the time that the grantors did not own such one-half interest, nevertheless the grantee is bound by the deed as it stands, since the language employed in it is the precise language intended at the time by both grantors and grantee to be so employed; there being no mistake of the draftsman in drawing the deed. Such position, as it seems to be, is in direct conflict with the well-settled doctrine on the subject.

As said in 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 853:

"All mistakes of fact in agreements executed or executory, express or implied, must be either concerning the subject-matter or the terms. In the first case the terms are stated according to the intent of both the parties, but there is an error of one or both in respect of the thing to which those terms apply, its * * * title, * * * and the like. * * *

The case before us belongs to the first class of cases mentioned in the quotation just made. The error under consideration concerns the subject-matter of the contract, not the terms (i. e., the language) intended to be used in the deed. There was no mistake in the language which was intended to be used in the deed; but the mistake of both grantors and grantee (or, as we shall presently more specifically mention, the mistake of the grantee induced by the fraudulent representations of the grantors and so coupled with the fraud of the grantors) "prevented from being put into writing" in the deed the whole subject-matter which was embraced in the contract of purchase, and which but therefor would have been put into the deed. 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 867. In such case it is immaterial that there is no mistake of the draftsman in drawing the deed. As is well settled, a court of equity will reform a deed where, by reason of fraud or mutual mistake, the language, fully understood and intended to be used in the deed, either embraces "subject-matters which were not intended by the parties to come within its operation, in which case the parol evidence will show that such subject-matters should be omitted and the relief demanded will be a correction which shall exclude them, * * *" or where the deed omits "certain subject-matters * * * which were intended by the parties to come within its operation; and in this case the parol evidence will show that such subject-matters should be included, and the relief demanded will be a modification of the writing, so that it shall embrace them and shall then extend its operation to particular subject-matters not mentioned in it, but to which it was originally intended to apply." See Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 865. The case before us is one in which the error prevented the terms of the deed from conveying the whole mineral interest embraced in the contract of purchase. Hence the case falls within the class of deeds last above mentioned.

As said by the same authority (section 866):

"The doctrine in all its breadth and force is maintained by courts and jurists of the highest ability and authority, which hold that, whether the contract is executory or executed, the plaintiff may introduce parol evidence to show mistake or fraud whereby the written contract fails to express the actual agreement, and to prove the modifications necessary to be made, whether such variation consists in limiting the scope of the contract, or in enlarging and extending it so as to embrace land or other subject-matter which had been omitted through the fraud or mistake, and that he may then obtain a specific performance of the contract thus varied, and such relief may be granted although the agreement is one which by the statute of frauds is required to be in writing. This view, in my opinion, is not only supported by the overwhelming preponderance of judicial authority, but is in complete accordance with the fundamental principles of equity jurisprudence. * * * The same broad view of the doctrine is clearly illustrated in the treatment of executed contracts or conveyances. It is settled by the great preponderance of authority that a deed of land may be thus corrected by enlarging its scope, extending its operation to other subject-matter, supplying portions of land which had been omitted, making the estate conveyed more comprehensive, as changing a life estate into a fee, and the like, and by enforcing the instrument thus varied against the grantor."

And as also said by the same authority (section 859):

"It is * * * settled that in suits, whenever permitted, to reform a written instrument on the ground of a mutual mistake, parol evidence is always admissible to establish the fact of the mistake and in what it consisted, and to show how the writing should be corrected in order to conform to the agreement which the parties actually made."

The same is true in cases of fraud. Id. § 872 et seq.

And the same doctrine is applicable where the reformation in the deed is sought to be made by the allegations of the answer of a defendant. Id. § 860, at page 1519.

Hence, in the view I take of the case, it is essential for the decision of the questions covered by the two holdings of the majority opinion above referred to that we should decide what the evidence in the cause establishes was the contract of purchase with respect to its difference from the deed, and what caused the reservation aforesaid to be inserted in the deed.

Upon such a question of fact it is true, as is well settled, that "the evidence must be clear, convincing, and satisfactory." Charles v. Charles, 127 Va. 604, 104 S. E. 823; Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 862. But the testimony of the defendant George W. McClanahan, who, it is to be remembered, was examined by the appellant, Green Charles, as a witness in his behalf, clearly, convincingly, and satisfactorily shows that the contract of purchase contained no reservation of any mineral interest in the land, and that it was not until subsequently to the payment and satisfaction in full by this defendant of the purchase money and other consideration for the land that, when the deed to be made by the vendors was mentioned, the vendors (through appellant) stated to the defendant vendee that they owned only a half interest in the mineral interests in the land, and for that reason alone would have to reserve such an interest by the provisions of the deed. Both of the vendors testify in the cause as witnesses for appellant, and it is, to my mind, a significant fact that neither of them denies, and the appellant practically admits, that they did represent to the said defendant at the time they made the deed to the latter, as the reason for the reservation aforesaid, that they owned only the half interest in the minerals which the deed by its provisions conveyed, and said defendant positively testified repeatedly in his deposition was their distinct representation on the subject; yet both of such vendors testify in effect that such representation was untrue; that they never thought that there was any defect in their title to the mineral interests except as to one-third of such interests. They testify in substance that they had a bona fide doubt at the time they made the deed to the said defendant as to whether they had any title to one-third of such mineral interest; but they did not so state the situation to such defendant. The appellant, Green Charles, testified on this subject as follows:

"Q. Wasn't the exception made because you did not think you owned the entire interest in the coal?"

"A. It might have been something bearing on my mind that way, that we did not own the entire interest; I could not say. * * *

"Q. Did you not state to George W. McClanahan that you did not own the one-half interest in the coal?"

"A. I don't remember of ever saying much to him about it. I might have said something to him that we didn't own it, on account of some settlement that was made in the Pearson survey."

D. M. Charles testified on the same subject as follows:

"We thought there was a third of the coal gone from us, but we were going to except half of it."

Such being the facts, it seems to me to clearly appear that the untrue representation of the grantors to the grantee as to the title was in effect a fraudulent representation, since the grantors knew at the time they made it that it was not a correct representation, and it was intended to induce the vendee to act upon it as being strictly correct.

There is nothing in the testimony in chief of appellant, or in the other evidence for appellant, in conflict with the testimony of said defendant with respect to what the contract of purchase was, except that there are certain statements in the testimony of appellant on cross-examination which are to the effect that in the contract of purchase it was understood that a half interest in the minerals was not embraced in the sale. But this merely creates a conflict in the evidence for appellant, and, to my mind, these statements in the testimony of appellant bear internal evidence of their untrustworthiness; and, besides, they come from one guilty of the fraudulent representation aforesaid; so that they do not, as I think, in any degree lessen the convincing force and effect of the testimony of the said defendant.

On the whole, therefore, I think that the case established by the evidence is as follows: The contract of purchase was of the land, including all mineral interests (meaning coal and other mineral interests). When the deed came to be made, the aforesaid reservation provision was inserted in it, solely because of the mistake of the grantee aforesaid in thinking that the grantors did not own and hence could not convey more than a half of the mineral interest embraced in the contract of purchase, such mistake on the part of the grantee being induced by the fraudulent representation aforesaid on the part of the grantors.

This presents, to my mind, a typical case for reformation of the deed under the well-settled doctrine on the subject. And the same would be true if the mistake aforesaid had been merely a mutual mistake of grantors and grantee.

McClanahan held the deed as he did for the 17 years before this suit was brought because he thought it was all the conveyance his grantors had it in their power to make him. He was led into this mistake by the false representation of his grantors aforesaid. From the bill in this suit McClanahan first discovered the existence of the mistake. He thereupon promptly answered the bill and asked for the reformation aforesaid of the deed.

I think, therefore, that the deed should be reformed in accordance with the prayer of the answer of the said defendant. It follows that the deed aforesaid of such defendant and wife to his son does not constitute any cloud upon any title of appellant, and hence should be allowed to stand as it is.

Bill by J. Harmon Duty and others against the Honaker Lumber Company and others. Bill, cross-bill, demurrer, exceptions, motions to strike out, and objections to pleadings dismissed, and decree entered dismissing the cause, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Chase & McCoy, of Clintwood, for appellants.

Greever, Gillespie & Divine, of Tazewell, Sutherland & Sutherland, of Clintwood, Bird & Lively, of Lebanon, and A. A. Skeen, of Clintwood, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. We do not think it necessary to recite the involved and complicated pleadings and procedure in this case. Counsel for the appellants, in their very accurate summary of all of these details allege that there are 17 separate issues. By eliminating all of the claimants of the land in controversy who disturb his theory of the case, he simplifies and reduces these issues to 5. Inasmuch as we think the case can and should be disposed of in accordance with certain general principles, we do not think it necessary to discuss these various issues and counterclaims, or the voluminous evidence introduced to support them, with any great particularity.

The complainants are the executors of the last will and testament of John H. Duty, deceased, his widow and children, and the grandchildren of John H. Duty, representing their deceased parents. They allege title to a tract of about 200 acres of land, one-half of which lies in Dickenson county and half in Buchanan county; the county line being the line of division. They allege that by a deed dated August 15, 1872, William B. Aston, as the agent of William Warder, conveyed this land to John H. Duty and his brother, Joel F. Duty; that at that time the entire tract lay in Buchanan county, but since then, in 1880, Dickenson county was formed; that Joel F. Duty, now deceased, in March, 1879, sold an undivided one-half interest in this land to Humberson Gilbert, who paid him therefor, but that he failed to convey to Gilbert; that Gilbert afterwards sold his interest to John H. Duty, thus making him the owner of the entire tract; that Joel F. Duty and Gilbert both died intestate, and both left widows and children surviving them; that three of the seven children of Joel F. Duty, by deed of November 1, 1910, conveyed to the living children of John H. Duty, among the complainants, all of their interest in the tract, but that the widow and other four children of Joel F. Duty, deceased, had failed to do so; that John H. Duty, in his lifetime, conveyed to the Honaker Lumber Company the timber growing on the tract, with certain rights of way.

The object of the suit, as stated in the petition, was:

"For the purpose of extracting the title to any interest or claim to any part of this 200-acre tract of land lying partly in Dickenson county and partly in Buchanan county, that may now be in the four children and widow of Joel F. Duty, deceased, who did not sign the deed of November 1, 1910, and in the heirs at law of Humberson Gilbert, deceased, by reason of this land being owned at one time by Joel F. Duty, deceased."

They therefore make such of the other heirs at law of John H. Duty as are not parties complainant to the suit parties defendant, as well as the heirs at law of Joel F. Duty, deceased, the heirs at law of Humberson Gilbert, deceased, and the Honaker Lumber Company, as the owner of the timber, with certain rights and privileges. The object of the suit, therefore, was to divest the heirs at law of Joel F. Duty and the heirs at law of Humberson Gilbert of any title there may be in them to any part or interest in the land, and to perfect the same in the heirs at law of John H. Duty, deceased, subject to the rights of the Honaker Lumber Company.

The court dismissed the bill, cross-bill, demurrer, exceptions, motions to strike out, and objections to the various pleadings, and adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the cause be dismissed, each party to pay his own costs.

Referring, first, then, to the claim of the complainants in the original bill, it appears that the paper filed as the original deed from Aston, as the agent of Warder, is not the original of such a deed, no such conveyance is proved, and for the first time apparently in the briefs filed in this court, the claim here is that it was a clumsy copy of the original which has been lost or destroyed. There is no sufficient evidence to support the title of the complainants asserted in the bill under this alleged deed, which is thoroughly discredited. The effort to set up a title by adverse possession under this alleged conveyance by the complainants is also without substantial support in the testimony, so that in our view there is no error in the decree as to the complainants in dismissing the original bill.

[1] The heirs of Joel F. Duty and Humberson Gilbert, who were made parties to the original bill, filed separate answers and cross-bills and each claimed for themselves the title to that part of the land known as the "tall timber" tract in Dickenson county. Those of Joel F. Duty's heirs who claim title allege that he sold this Dickenson county tract to Humberson Gilbert, and that Gilbert afterwards abandoned the sale and sold his interest back to Joel F. Duty. The heirs at law of Humberson Gilbert, however, claim that they are the true owners of this Dickenson county tract, because of an alleged deed from Thomas W. Davis, agent of the Warders, to Humberson Gilbert, and in addition that their ancestor acquired title by adverse possession. In addition to this W. R. and A. W. Davis, who were not defendants in the original bill, filed their petition, claiming the "Gum Hollow" or Buchanan county portion of the tract under a conveyance from the agent of the Warders in 1902, and alleging that this is the true title, because the pretended deed of 1872 to John H. and Joel F. Duty is a forgery. Then again comes one Minnie Humphreys Jones and files her petition, claiming title to the Dickenson county portion of the tract under a paper executed to her by Davis, agent of the owners, and also under a deed from Pobst, commissioner, conveying to her the unsold Warder land in Dickenson county. She also alleges that the pretended deed of 1872 to John H. and Joel F. Duty is a forgery, denies that T. W. Davis, as agent for the Warders ever conveyed the land to Humberson Gilbert, or that he ever had any title or right to it. Thus we have the heirs at law of John H. Duty, deceased, claiming all the land involved, that in Buchanan as well as that in Dickenson county; W. R. Davis and A. W. Davis claiming the "Gum Hollow" tract in Buchanan county, Minnie Humphreys Jones, the heirs of Joel F. Duty and the heirs of Humberson Gilbert all claiming the "tall timber" tract in Dickenson county.

Because the testimony upon which these various claimants, undertaking to sustain their title to the land in controversy may doubtless at some time be submitted to a jury for consideration, we refrain from expressing any opinion as to its probative value.

[2] The rule in cases of this sort has been so recently stated by this court in Litz v. Rowe, 117 Va. 752, 86 S. E. 155, L. R. A. 1916B, 799, that it is hardly necessary to do more than cite that case. Except when the relief which is authorized by Code 1919, § 6248, is sought, and in the absence of some peculiar equity courts of equity are without jurisdiction to settle disputes regarding the title and boundaries of land. It is perfectly apparent from the recitals which we have made that there is a vigorous dispute as to the true ownership of the lands here in controversy. The petitions and cross-bills of those who were not parties defendant to the original bill should have been dismissed without prejudice. If they or either of them had the true title they would not be bound by any decree in the case. Not being parties to the suit their interests were in no way jeopardized, and they could not have been prejudiced by any decree entered in that case. An action of ejectment, under such circumstances generally affords a complete and adequate remedy for the assertion of a title or interest in land in this state.

Other cases supporting this view could be cited, but it is only necessary to paraphrase what is said in Bailey v. Johnson, 118 Va. 505, 88 S. E. 62. The circuit court, in the original suit in equity for the removal of a certain cloud alleged to rest upon complainants' title, was without jurisdiction in that cause to determine the question of title as between these several independent, distinct, and hostile claims. Such an independent and hostile claim, involving the whole property, and denying in toto and ab initio the title of the complainants, cannot be set up and adjudicated in a suit in equity. To permit this would authorize an adverse claimant to implead other claimants of the title in such a way as to substitute an equity suit for an action of ejectment.

As to the parties who were impleaded as defendants to the original suit, as it appears that they claim title under the same invalid deed under which the complainants claim, they were also properly denied any affirmative relief in this suit.

[3] Without intending to express any opinion as to the preponderance of the testimony, it appears to us that each of the adverse claimants was quite successful in showing the invalidity of the claims of each of the others. Like the lean cattle which Pharaoh in his dream saw emerge from the river, they have eaten the others up, but nevertheless they are themselves just as lean as they were at the beginning. If the allegations of the original bill had been proved, doubtless the equitable relief prayed for could have been afforded. As all of the parties to the original transactions are dead and there is no written evidence of value, any conclusion which the court might reach would necessarily be conjectural and founded upon random guess, rather than based upon any sufficient proof. When this is the case a court of equity invariably denies relief, because a just determination and settlement of the controversy is impossible. Essential allegations, which the parties to such a controversy cannot prove with reasonable certainty, cannot without evidence be assumed by the court to be true. Nelson v. Triplett, 99 Va. 421, 39 S. E. 150; Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. 115, 40 S. E. 630; Hill v. Saunders, 115 Va. 60, 78 S. E. 559.

Like the learned circuit judge, therefore, we find ourselves unable to determine these controversies under these pleadings and the evidence which was submitted. The true title can only be determined in an action or actions of ejectment, or possibly by suit in equity under Code 1919, § 6248. These remedies remain open to each of the claimants.

Affirmed.

YOUNG et al. v. BOWEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1022(1)—Findings of master sustained by trial court not disturbed.

Findings of master on evidence taken before him concerning items in a suit to surcharge and falsify an ex parte account of an administrator, which are sustained by the trial court, will not as a rule be disturbed on appeal.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨516(6)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain charge against administrator.

In an action to surcharge and falsify an ex parte account of an administrator, evidence held insufficient to sustain a charge against the administrator made by the master.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨513(2)—Ex parte settlements of commissioner of accounts presumed correct.

In a suit to surcharge and falsify an ex parte account of an administrator, ex parte settlements of the commissioner of accounts are presumed to be correct until surcharged and falsified (Code 1919, § 5429), and not only the duty of specifying errors, but also the onus probandi, devolves on the party complaining.

4. Executors and administrators ⇨132—Administrator had no authority to construct storehouse.

An administrator has no authority to use funds of the estate to erect a storehouse upon land of the estate, and where he constructs such a building and it is burned, he is liable to the estate for the funds used in its construction, with interest.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨132—Administrator to be credited with income obtained from improper investment.

Where administrator without authority used funds of estate to erect a storehouse which was subsequently burned, in charging him with the amount of the funds thus diverted, with interest, he should be credited with rents collected by distributees before the fire.

6. Executors and administrators ⇨516(7)—Administrator entitled to credit for item improperly charged against himself.

In a suit to surcharge and falsify the ex parte account of an administrator, the administrator should be credited with an item with which he had improperly charged himself in his ex parte settlement, where the mistake was called to the attention of the court by the administrator's answer, which he prayed to be read as a cross-bill.

7. Executors and administrators ⇨516(7)—Principal and surety ⇨194(1)—In action to surcharge account, widow, as administrator's surety, cannot obtain judgment against co-sureties until she has paid more than her share of the debt.

A widow who signs as surety on the bond of an administrator may obtain a judgment against the administrator in a suit by herself and distributees to surcharge and falsify an ex parte account of the administrator, but is not entitled to a judgment against her co-sureties until she has paid more than her part of the debt of the principal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Scott County.

Action by Reese Bowen, guardian, and others against P. C. Young, administrator of the estate of J. F. Chesser, deceased, and others. Decree for plaintiffs; and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

W. S. Cox and S. H. Bond, both of Gate City, for appellants.

Coleman & Carter, of Big Stone Gap, for appellees.

BURKS, J. This is a suit by the widow and distributees of J. F. Chesser to surcharge and falsify the ex parte accounts of P. C. Young, as administrator of the estate of the said J. F. Chesser. The cause was referred to a master to take evidence and restate the accounts, by a decree rendered in June, 1911, but the master did not make his report till September, 1917. To this report there were 16 exceptions by the administrator. At the September term, 1918, the circuit court overruled all of said exceptions, and entered the decree appealed from.

[1] The petition for the appeal assigns 14 errors to the rulings of the trial court, and some of the assignments embrace numerous items. Except as hereinafter stated, the findings of the master are approved. The findings of the master were based on the testimony of sundry witnesses, and it would not be profitable to discuss in detail the reasons for sustaining the findings of the master which were approved by the trial court. The evidence was taken by the master, and as to many of the items was conflicting. In such case his findings sustained by the trial court will not, as a rule, be disturbed by this court. Smiley v. Smiley, 112 Va. 490, 71 S. E. 532, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1159. But some of the findings of the master appear to be so plainly wrong that we cannot give them our approval.

The master charged the administrator with the price of a saw, $125, and interest thereon $126.25. It satisfactorily appears that this saw went with the sawmill as a part thereof, and the estate got the benefit of it in the price paid for the sawmill. While there is some slight evidence tending to show that the saw did not go with the mill, the great weight of the evidence is to the contrary, and there is no evidence that the administrator derived any benefit therefrom.

The administrator is also charged by the master with $82.75 principal, and $30.82 interest on the same, for excess payment to Elizabeth Chesser. The evidence to sustain this charge is the testimony of Elizabeth Chesser, is very brief, and is as follows:

"Q. 9. You speak of P. C. Young, administrator, having collected $82 and some cents amount overpaid by him? You and P. C. Young, J. D. Carter, and Reese Bowen, guardian, went over the account of P. C. Young, administrator, with a view to making a settlement, and did not P. C. Young, Reese Bowen, guardian, come to Gate City and get the commissioner of accounts to make the settlement, and then reported to you that the amount overpaid was $82.75?"

"A. Yes, sir; that is what they reported.

"Q. 10. Do you remember whether Reese Bowen, guardian, was present when you refunded to P. C. Young the amount you speak of?"

"A. P. C. Young owed me some; he retained the $82.75 out of the amount he owed me. Reese Bowen was present when the settlement was made."

[2, 3] This was not sufficient to sustain the charge made by the master. It does not appear therefrom that the estate of the intestate was in any way affected by the refund. Furthermore, the settlement was made by the commissioner of accounts, and it is to be presumed that if it was proper to make a charge therefor against the administrator he would have done so. The ex parte settlements of the commissioner of accounts are presumed to be correct until surcharged and falsified (Code, § 5429), and "not only the duty of specifying errors, but also the onus probandi, devolves on the party complaining. Peale v. Hickie, 9 Grat. [50 Va.] 445; Corbin v. Mills, 19 Grat. [60 Va.] 438." See notes to section 5429 of Code.

[4, 5] The master failed to allow the administrator any credit for rent received by the widow and the guardian of the infant distributees from a storehouse erected by him out of funds of the estate on land of the decedent. The administrator, without authority, used funds of the estate to erect the storehouse, which was subsequently destroyed by fire. He had no authority to thus use the funds of the estate, and the master properly charged him therewith, but before the storehouse was burned the widow and guardian collected rents therefrom amounting to $401.25. To this extent they profited thereby, and the administrator should have had credit therefor. Counsel for the appellee surmise that the master did not compute interest on the amount invested during the time that the widow and guardian were collecting the rents, but there is no evidence of this fact. It is a mere surmise. The administrator should be charged with the principal and with interest on the fund diverted from the date of the diversion, and credited by the $401.25 collected from the rents.

[6] The master failed to credit the administrator with $518.83 principal and $50.06 interest, with which he had been improperly charged in his ex parte settlement. This mistake had been called to the attention of the court by the administrator's answer, which he had prayed to be read as a crossbill, and which was not answered by the complainants in the original bill. The item appears in the ex parte settlement as follows:

"1902 Sept. 15th to amt. of acct. of J. F. Chesser due Chesser and Young for estate $518.83, interest on same April 24, 1904, $50.06."

It seems very plain that a debt due by Chesser could not be charged to his administrator as an asset received by the latter. The cause should be referred back to a master to make these corrections.

Assignments of error 12, 13, and 14 are as follows:

"(12) The court erred in giving judgment against your petitioners, W. P. Peterson and I. P. Robinett, they only being cosureties on the bond of P. C. Young along with Elizabeth Chesser, one of the plaintiffs in the case. Under the pleadings in the case and the proof it was error to give judgment against your two petitioners.

"(13) Your petitioners I. P. Robinett and W. P. Peterson allege and represent that there is error against them, even if there is no other error in the case, in rendering judgment against them in favor of Reese Bowen, guardian, and not also including Elizabeth Chesser along with them in said judgment. Elizabeth Chesser was cosurety with your petitioners, she was liable jointly with them on the bond, and it is certainly error to give judgment against two of the sureties on the bond and not include all three when they are all before the court.

"(14) The court erred in rendering judgment against your petitioners I. P. Robinett and W. P. Peterson in favor of Elizabeth Chesser for the full amount found due her. If Elizabeth Chesser is due the amount found by the commissioner to be due to her, your petitioners as co-sureties with her would only be liable to Elizabeth Chesser for two-thirds of the amount due her. Here we have a judgment against two co-sureties in favor of the third co-surety for the full amount of the debt found to be due the co-surety by the principal in the case."

In reply, counsel for the appellees say:

"We admit that the lower court erred in the particulars stated in these assignments of error by appellants. But we assume that this honorable court will in this respect modify the decree of the lower court and in all other respects affirm the same."

[7] We are unable to make the desired correction in the present condition of the record. J. F. Chesser died intestate leaving a widow and six children, and his widow is one of the three sureties on the administrator's bond. His widow, three adult children, and the guardian of the other three are the complainants in this suit. All of the children are now of age, and each is entitled to a decree for his or her share of the estate. The record does not show what each child has received. It will be necessary to restate the account of the administrator to ascertain with what sum he is chargeable in conformity with this opinion, and also to state a distributees' account to ascertain definitely how the balance found against the administrator is to be distributed among the several distributees. When these facts are ascertained, each child will be entitled to a decree in his or her favor against the administrator and the sureties on his bond for the amount ascertained to be due to him or her; but the widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Chesser, is not entitled to any decree against her co-sureties in the present state of the record. It may be that her co-sureties will have to pay the full amount of the decrees in favor of the children, and this may result in their having a claim against her, instead of being indebted to her. She can have a decree against the administrator but not against her co-sureties at the present time. A surety is not entitled to a judgment against his co-surety until he has paid more than his part of the debt of the principal. Davies v. Humphreys, 20 Eng. Rul. Cas. 632; 21 R. O. L. 1134; 1 Barton Law Fr. (2d Ed.) 106, and cases cited.

The decree of the circuit court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to make the inquiries hereinbefore mentioned, and to settle the rights of the parties in accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed.

Reversed.

GOINS v. GARBER.

(131 Va. 59)

1. Costs  $\S$  134—Refusal of late motion to require nonresident complainants to increase security for costs not unreasonable discretion.

The court having in the first instance complied with the mandatory provisions of Code 1904,  $\S$  3539, by requiring complainant, on suggestion of his nonresidence, to give security for costs, and defendant not having then objected to the amount of the bond, the court was required only to exercise reasonable discretion as to any subsequent motion for increase of security; so that such motion being made when the case was about to be disposed of on the merits, and not passed on till after decisions on the merits against defendant, refusal of the motion was reasonable.

2. Equity  $\S$  276—No abuse of discretion in rejecting answer to amended bill.

Where amended bill was filed merely to bring in unknown heirs, it was not an abuse of discretion to reject answer of the original defendant to the amended bill, it being merely an amplification of his answer to the original, bringing in no matter of defense not in general terms embraced in the first answer, and being unnecessary.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$  1032(1) — Appellant must show error was prejudicial.

Appellant, the original defendant, complaining of directions to the commissioner to summon before him any one that he deems a necessary party, must show, not only error therein, but that the error was prejudicial to him.

4. Infants  $\S$  77—Guardian ad litem properly appointed for infants appearing among unknown heirs named as defendants.

It appearing that infants were among the "unknown heirs" named as defendants in an amended bill for specific performance, it was proper for the court, under Code 1919,  $\S$  6098, to appoint a guardian ad litem to defend their interests.

5. Vendor and purchaser  $\S$  131—Title by adverse possession enough.

It is enough that a vendor has a good title by adverse possession.

6. Vendor and purchaser  $\S$  172 — Purchaser chargeable with interest after maturity of noninterest-bearing notes.

Where there are no serious defects in a vendor's title, and the purchaser has been in possession from the giving of title bond, he is properly charged with interest from maturity of noninterest-bearing purchase-money notes.

7. Appeal and error  $\S$  1171(1)—Assignment held frivolous and de minimis.

The assignment by appellant, defendant in suit by vendor against purchaser for specific performance of a contract of purchase of 107 acres of land for $300, that the court erred in awarding writ of possession against W., a person whose claim to and possession of less than an acre of the land began after defendant purchased and took possession, must be regarded as frivolous and de minimis, defendant not asking for rescission, and the only possible relief that he could claim, even if W. had title, being an insignificant abatement of purchase money.

8. Appeal and error  $\Leftarrow$  984(1)—Decree, otherwise affirmed, not interfered with in respect to costs except for palpable error.

A decree, affirmed in all other respects, will not be interfered with in respect to costs, a matter resting in the lower court's discretion, unless there is palpable error in that respect.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lee County.

Suit for specific performance by Elkanah Garber against J. H. Goins. From an adverse decree, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. T. Hyatt, of Jonesville, for appellant.
Jas. W. Orr, of Jonesville, for appellee.

KELLY, P. A sufficient preliminary statement of the case is this: On the 18th of December, 1907, Elkanah Garber executed a title bond to J. H. Goins whereby he bound himself to convey to Goins on or before the 17th of December, 1908, a tract of land containing 107 acres. By the terms named in the bond the sale was made by the boundary and not by the acre, and the purchase price was $300, paid and to be paid as follows: $50 cash and $50 each succeeding year for five years, the deferred payments being represented by five notes executed by Goins. The bond specified that Garber should make to Goins "a good and sufficient deed with covenants of general warranty and free from incumbrances."

Goins entered at once into possession of the land, and (with the exception of two small portions known as the Rhoda Lawson land and the Null Wallen land hereinafter mentioned) has remained in possession ever since, but he made no further payments on the purchase price.

In July, 1916, Garber filed his bill to specifically enforce the contract. He had not theretofore tendered Goins a deed, but alleged that he had not done so because no further payments had been made on the price, and he offered and filed a deed with his bill. Goins answered, setting up several minor defenses, but relying principally upon the allegation that Garber did not have a good title to the land. He did not ask for a rescission of the contract, but merely that Garber be required to perfect his title before any decree should be rendered to enforce the payment of the purchase money. There was an amended bill and an answer thereto, both of which will be more particularly mentioned later.

The cause was referred to George P. Cridlin, one of the commissioners of the court, to report on the state of the title, and he returned first a preliminary and later a final and very full and complete report. Upon the coming in of the latter, the court entered a decree confirming the same, disposing of all the questions in the case, and directing a sale of the land, unless within 30 days thereafter Goins should pay the balance of the purchase money and the costs of the suit. From that decree this appeal was taken.

[1] 1. The first assignment of error is that the court improperly overruled a motion by the defendant to require the complainant, who was a nonresident, to give an additional bond to secure the costs. The assignment is without merit. The motion in question was made after the cause was fully matured for hearing on the merits and at the term at which the final decree was entered. At a very early stage of the case the defendant had, pursuant to the statute, Code 1904, § 3539, suggested the nonresidence of the complainant, and the court had accordingly ordered the latter to execute a cost bond in the penalty of $50. This bond was duly given, and no objection was then made as to the amount of the penalty, nor does it appear that any question was raised in that respect until four years later when the case was about to be disposed of on its merits. The court, having complied with the mandatory provisions of the statute in the first instance, was only bound to exercise reasonable discretion in regard to any subsequent motion for increase of the security. The motion was not passed on until after the court had decided the merits of the case adversely to the defendant, and its refusal of the motion by the same decree which disposed of all the other questions was a perfectly reasonable and natural consequence.

[2] 2. The next assignment charges that the court erred in sustaining the complainant's exceptions to the defendant's answer to the amended bill.

The answer to the original bill, after a general denial of title in the complainant, undertook to point out certain particular defects therein. When the cause came on to be heard the first time on the original bill, the answer thereto, and certain depositions, the court deemed it necessary and accordingly directed that the complainant should amend his bill to bring in new parties, in whom it appeared that the legal title to the land, or some part thereof, might be outstanding. This action of the court was in direct furtherance of the course suggested by the defendant's answer, and was eminently proper. In plain compliance with this direction an amended bill was filed, bringing in new parties, all of whom, with the exception of one man whose name was given, were described in the decree ordering the amendment merely as the "unknown heirs" of certain deceased persons therein named, and by proper allegations the latter were made defendants to the amended bill under the general designation of "unknown heirs" of the deceased persons aforesaid.

The amended bill was filed on the 28th of September, 1916. At the September term, 1920, after all the evidence had been taken, the final report of Commissioner Cridlin filed, and the cause fully prepared for hearing, the defendant tendered and was allowed to file what he termed an answer to the amended bill. This paper was prepared and offered by counsel who had recently come into the case in place of the attorney originally employed, whose business had called him permanently to another jurisdiction. It was an amplification of the first answer, but it was not necessary. There was no matter of defense therein which was not in general terms embraced in the first answer and in the issue theretofore made up and referred to the commissioner. Under these circumstances there was no error in rejecting the answer, which in effect was done by sustaining the exceptions thereto. Applications to amend answers rest in every case in the sound discretion of the court. 1 Bart. Chy. Pr. p. 445. In our opinion there was no abuse of discretion in this instance.

[3] 3. The third assignment of error is as follows:

"The circuit court erred in directing Geo. P. Cridlin, commissioner, to report upon any other matter than the state of the title to the land in controversy, and particularly in directing the said commissioner to summon before him any person, or persons, whom he should deem necessary parties to the cause."

It is conceded that the reference to a commissioner for the purpose of having a report upon the title was entirely proper, but the defendant contends that the following provision in the decree was erroneous:

"Said commissioner will also ascertain and report whether or not all necessary parties are before the court that should be made parties in the cause, and should he find that any necessary party is not before the court he will summon such party before him as commissioner, either by personal service or by publication in some newspaper in the manner and for the length of time that orders of publication are made against nonresident defendants."

When the appeal was granted in this case we were disposed to think that this assignment raised a very interesting question of practice, namely, the question as to the binding effect of a decree in a case of this sort where an interested party not named in the pleadings, and who does not at any time voluntarily appear, is brought into the case, and his rights adjudicated upon no other process than a notice given by a commissioner acting in pursuance of a general direction of the court to convene any necessary parties not theretofore named as such in the proceeding. Upon more mature consideration of the very voluminous record, however, we find that the question is not material here, and that it is entirely moot so far as the decree complained of is concerned.

The commissioner, in compliance with the provision of the decree above quoted, after much care and labor, compiled a long list of persons who were probably interested in the title to the land. This list in the main was comprised of persons referred to in the bill as "unknown heirs." By this general classification they had already been made parties to the proceeding, and an order of publication had been made and published against them as such. The statute (Code 1904, § 3230) expressly authorizes this course, and no objection was made to the sufficiency of the bill or publication in that respect.

The commissioner published a notice, as directed by the decree, addressed to all the persons named in the list compiled by him as aforesaid, and in addition to such publication caused the notice to be served personally on a number of the individuals named therein.

It seems altogether probable that every person who could be regarded as a necessary party to the suit (except possibly Rhoda Lawson, who appeared and whose interest was recognized and properly disposed of, and Null Wallen, whose claim is hereinafter dealt with) was embraced either by name or under the general designation of "unknown heirs." The notice, therefore, as to them was given in the manner authorized by the statute, Code 1904, § 3321. This section does not limit the class of cases in which a court of equity may direct that notice be given for hearings before its commissioners. Hill v. Bowyer, 18 Grat. (59 Va.) 364, 380. Whether there were some persons included in such publication or personally served who were not in any way made parties to the bill and did not appear, and, if so, how far they were bound by the commissioner's report and the decree confirming the same, are questions which we need not decide. No such person (unless it be Null Wallen) is pointed out to us in the assignment under consideration, and no harmful error on account of any such fact is specified. It is incumbent upon an appellant, not only to show error in the proceeding complained of, but to show also that the error was prejudicial.

[4] 4. The preliminary report of the commissioner showed that several persons named in the aforesaid list of interested parties were infants, and the court appointed a guardian ad litem to defend their interests. Accordingly the guardian filed his answer in that capacity, and also an answer for the infants by himself as guardian. It is alleged that this was error because the infants in question had not been made parties in the suit. This position is not tenable. These infants were among the "unknown heirs" named as defendants in the amended bill, and the action of the court was therefore entirely regular and proper. See Code 1919, § 6098.

[5] 5. The fifth assignment of error is that the court erred in holding that Elkanah Garber had such title to the land in controversy as he contracted to convey, and therefore erred in decreeing specific performance.

The finding and adjudication of the court upon this point as expressed in its decree was as follows:

"That while the complainant, at the time he contracted said land to the defendant, J. H. Goins, had no legal title thereto, and has not, since that time, acquired such legal title, yet his claim thereto by reason of the turning over to him by A. B. Smith and Wm. Goins of the title bond executed to them therefor by John M. Tate, coupled with his possession thereof to the date of said contract and the possession of the defendant since the date of the said contract, constitutes such title as he contracted to convey, namely, 'a good and sufficient deed with covenants of general warranty, and free from incumbrances,' and this notwithstanding the fact that the said John M. Tate, who executed the said title bond to the said A. B. Smith and Wm. Goins, never had any legal title to the said land."

It is said in the brief of counsel that this language of the court, showing that the complainant had only a possessory title, demonstrates the error complained of. This is altogether a mistaken idea. The evidence warranted the court in finding that the complainant had acquired a good title by adverse possession, and his title therefore was as free from valid objection as if it had been acquired by a deed from a former true owner, or by a grant from the commonwealth. McClanahan's Adm'r v. N. & W. R. Co., 122 Va. 705, 716, 96 S. E. 453.

[6] 6. Error is assigned on the ground that the court overruled the defendant's exceptions to the commissioner's report.

The first two exceptions involve legal questions of no special interest or novelty, and pecuniary amounts which are de minimis, and as to these we content ourselves by saying merely that the exceptions were properly overruled. The only other exception was that the commissioner improperly allowed interest on the first three of the purchase-money notes from their maturity. The title bond from Garber to Goins provided for five notes of $50 each, "to become due in one, two, three, four and five years, the first three of said notes without interest, and the other two and last of said notes to bear interest from date." Of course the commissioner was right in charging interest on the notes after maturity, unless there were some peculiar circumstances in the case to take these notes out of the general rule that interest follows the principal after maturity "as the shadow follows the substance." It is contended that there are such circumstances, and that no interest should be charged "until the complainant procured a good title and delivered a deed in accordance with the stipulations of said title bond." It turns out as a matter of fact that there were no serious defects in the title, and, moreover, the defendant has been in possession of the land ever since the title bond was given. Under these circumstances it was clearly right to charge him with the interest. See Barnett v. Cloyd, 125 Va. 546, 100 S. E. 674; Cohen v. Jenkins, 125 Va. 635, 100 S. E. 678.

[7] 7. The seventh assignment is:

"That the court erred in the decree of September 13, 1920, in awarding a writ of possession against Null Wallen for the 147 square poles of land of which he was then in possession."

There is nothing in the record to show that Null Wallen had any valid claim to this less than one acre of land in controversy. He does not appear to have been a party to the bill by name or by any general designation of classes, but he was served with notice by the commissioner, and the commissioner reported that "He did not appear and would not appear," that the commissioner was therefore unable to obtain any evidence of Wallen's claim, and accordingly reported that Wallen had no valid claim, and that a judgment should go against him for the land claimed by him.

Whether this action bound Wallen or not, it is evident that the assignment must be regarded as frivolous and de minimis. Wallen's claim and possession began after the land had been sold to and had been taken possession of by the defendant. The latter is not asking for rescission, and even if it were conceded (instead of being otherwise reported by a very accurate and careful commissioner) that Wallen had title to the small piece of land claimed by him, the only possible relief which the defendant could claim would be an insignificant abatement of the purchase money.

[8] 8. The eighth assignment is that the court erred in rendering judgment against the petitioner in favor of the complainant for costs.

This assignment does not involve the general costs of this suit, but only a very small portion thereof accruing at an early stage of the case. The question of costs was one resting in the discretion of the lower court, and we see no evidence here of an abuse of that discretion. When this court affirms a decree in all other respects, it will not interfere with the decision in respect to the costs of the cause unless there is palpable error in that particular. Wimblish v. Blanks, 76 Va. 365. 369; Williams v. Bond, 120 Va. 678, 689, 91 S. E. 627.

The decree complained of is affirmed.
Affirmed.

FISHER v. FISHER et al. (No. 4274.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 4, 1921.)

1. Damages §94—Compensatory damages must be considered in fixing amount of punitive damages.

Punitive or exemplary damages should not be awarded in any case where the amount of compensatory damages is adequate to punish the defendant; and in a case where such compensatory damages are not adequate for the purpose of punishment, only such additional amount should be awarded as, taken together with the compensatory damages, will be sufficient therefor.

2. Damages §215(1)—Instruction that jury may allow punitive damages in addition to compensatory damages held error.

An instruction should not be given which directs the jury that, if they are of opinion to award punitive damages, they may allow the same in addition to the damages to which they find the plaintiff to be entitled as compensation.

3. Libel and slander §124(7)—Jury should be instructed to consider provocation in mitigation of damages.

In an action for insulting words, it is proper for the jury, in mitigation of damages, to consider the provocation under which the words were uttered produced by conduct on the part of the plaintiff, and an instruction offered to this effect should be given.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Libel and slander §124(1)—Jury were properly told that statute was applicable to women as well as men.

It was proper for the court to tell the jury that the statute under which an action was brought for insulting words was applicable to women, as well as men; the defendant being a woman.

5. Appeal and error §1064(1)—Trial §243—Instructions in slander case as to construction of words held not necessarily conflicting, but harmless error, if conflicting.

In action for insulting words, an instruction that the jury should give them their ordinary and popular meaning, and another that they must so construe them unless used in a different sense, held not necessarily in conflict, but, if conflicting, harmless, where applied to the facts in the case, both meant the same.

Error to Circuit Court, Wood County.

Action by Cora E. Fisher against May H. Fisher and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

F. P. Moats, Reese Blizzard, and C. M. Hanna, all of Parkersburg, for plaintiffs in error.

Robert B. McDougale, C. N. Matheny, and H. D. Matthews, all of Parkersburg, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. In this action to recover damages for insulting words, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000, upon which judgment was rendered, to review which this writ of error is prosecuted.

The plaintiff, Cora E. Fisher, and the defendant, May H. Fisher, married brothers. At the time of her marriage the plaintiff was a widow, having three children of her own, and her husband was a widower, having four children. Since their marriage five children have been born to them. One of the children of the plaintiff by her former marriage and one of the children of her husband by his former marriage were in the military service during the late world war, and both of these boys were killed in action, one in the latter part of October, 1918, and the other on the 8th day of November, 1918. One of the children of the plaintiff by her second husband died of asthma in May, 1917, and another of their children was burned to death in the month of May, 1920, at the home of a neighbor. This latter child was of very tender years, and his clothes seem to have become ignited while playing with matches with the children of a neighbor family at their home. These facts are stated as it is insisted they have a material bearing upon the case, and made the words used of a peculiarly aggravating nature.

The occurrence giving rise to this litigation happened on the 18th day of June, 1920. According to the contention of the plaintiff, on that day Mrs. Homer Wenmouth came to her house for the purpose of receiving some strawberries which she had theretofore purchased. The plaintiff says that she went with Mrs. Wenmouth to the back of the house to get the strawberries, and after delivering them Mrs. Wenmouth started to return to the street by the way she had come, when plaintiff remarked to her that she might walk across the lawn, a nearer way, to which her visitor replied that some people would not like others to walk on their grass, to which the plaintiff replied that she did not care, but it would be different if it was on the next lawn, the next lawn belonging to the residence of the defendants. The defendant,

May Fisher, seems to have taken offense at this time, and addressed to the plaintiff some excited remarks which the plaintiff did not understand, and upon inquiring of the said May Fisher to whom she was speaking, and being informed that she was talking to plaintiff, plaintiff asked her to come closer, so that what she said could be heard; that the parties thereupon approached each other, and when they came close together the defendant, May Fisher, said to the plaintiff in an angry and excited tone:

"You let your children die like dogs. Yes, indeed, madam, every one of them. If you would stay in the house, and not stand around out on the lawn and point me out in overalls, your children wouldn't die like dogs."

This language was resented by the plaintiff, and after some criminations and recriminations the parties separated. The plaintiff's contention in regard to the language used by Mrs. May Fisher is borne out by Mrs. Wenmouth, who was present, and by Lula Wagner and James Shepherd. The defendant admits the altercation, but denies that she used the language attributed to her by the plaintiff. She says that all she said was that the plaintiff neglected her children, and asserted on the witness stand that she sticks to that statement, and she contends that this statement was occasioned by the plaintiff pointing to her while she was in her back yard clad in overalls. As before stated, the jury's verdict was in favor of the plaintiff.

The defendants contend that the court erred in giving to the jury certain instructions on motion of the plaintiff, in refusing to give instruction No. 2 offered by the defendants, and that the damages awarded are excessive.

[4] The defendants insist that the court erred in giving to the jury plaintiff's instructions Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 6. Instruction No. 2 says that there is nothing in the antidueling law, or any other law, that would prevent the plaintiff from recovering because the defendant who used the alleged insulting words is a woman. It is not claimed that this instruction is vicious as a proposition of law, but that it was without application to the case. It occurs to us that this criticism is without merit. The defendant who used the alleged insulting words in this case is a woman, and it was entirely proper for the court to tell the jury that the statute under which the suit was brought was applicable to women as well as to men.

[5] Defendants claim that instructions 3 and 4 are inconsistent and contradictory. Instruction No. 3 is to the effect that, if the jury believed the words used, from their usual construction and common acceptance, to be insulting, and to tend to violence and a breach of the peace, they were actionable words, unless it appeared from the manner of speaking them, and the circumstances which occasioned their use, that they were used in a different sense; and instruction No. 4 tells the jury that, in determining whether or not the language complained of is insulting, the words must be construed in the plain and popular sense in which the rest of the world would naturally understand them. The conflict in these two instructions, according to the contention of the defendants, is that in the latter the jury is told that, in construing the words, they must give them their ordinary and popular meaning, while in the former they are told that they must give them this meaning, unless it appears that they were used in a different sense. This conflict is more apparent than real, however, when we apply these instructions to the facts in this case. Instruction No. 3 was taken from the case of Michaelson v. Turk, 79 W. Va. 31, 90 S. E. 395, in which the defendant attempted to show that, while the words in their ordinary sense were very insulting, they were used at the time in a figurative sense, which was understood by all of the parties present. In this case there is no attempt to show that the language used was intended to convey any different meaning from what the words would import, so that the qualification of instruction No. 3, in regard to construing them in another sense in case the jury found that they were used in a different sense from what they would ordinarily be understood, was unnecessary, and should not have been given in this case. However, this qualification of the instruction was entirely harmless, inasmuch as there was no evidence before the jury to which it could be applied. These instructions, as applied to the facts in this case, mean exactly the same thing, and there was, of course, no necessity for giving more than one of them.

[1] One of the principal contentions of the defendants is that the court erred in giving instruction No. 6, which is as follows:

"The court further instructs the jury that, in determining the amount of damages to which the plaintiff may be entitled, if they believe she is entitled to recover under all the instructions, they shall take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case as disclosed by the evidence, the nature and character of the charges, the language in which they are expressed, and its tendency, the occasion on which they were published, the extent of their circulation and probable effect upon those to whose attention they came, and their natural and probable effect upon the plaintiff's personal feelings, and her standing in the community in which she lives; and, if under the other instructions herein she is entitled to recover, they should award her such sum by way of damages as will fairly and adequately compensate her: (a) For the insult to her, including any pain and mortification and mental suffering inflicted upon her; and (b) for any injury to her reputation as a woman and citizen. And if the jury believe, from all the evidence in this case, that the acts complained of were influenced by actual malice and a willful design to injure or oppress the plaintiff, she may recover in this action, in addition to such damages as those mentioned above, punitive or exemplary damages; that is to say, that the jury will not be limited in the amount of its verdict for the plaintiff to compensation to her for the actual damages sustained as above indicated. They may give her such further damages as they may think right, in view of all the circumstances of the case, as a punishment for the defendant, and as a salutary example to others to deter them from offending in a like manner, but said damages are not to exceed $25,000."

It is insisted that this instruction violates the rule well established by this court for awarding punitive damages as announced in the cases of Claborne v. Ry. Co., 46 W. Va. 363, 33 S. E. 262, Allen v. Lopinsky, 81 W. Va. 13, 94 S. E. 369, Hess v. Marinari, 81 W. Va. 500, 94 S. E. 968, Pendleton v. Ry. Co., 82 W. Va. 270, 95 S. E. 941, and Goodman v. Klein, 87 W. Va. 300, 104 S. E. 726, in this: That it directs the jury that they may allow such punitive damages in addition to the compensatory damages. The doctrine announced in the above cases, that punitive damages can only be awarded to a plaintiff when the compensatory damages are not sufficient for the purpose of punishment, and this only to the extent that, taken together with the compensatory damages, the purpose of punishment will be met, is not questioned, but it is insisted by the plaintiff that this instruction is not susceptible of the interpretation placed upon it by the defendants, and the case of Turk v. Ry. Co., 75 W. Va. 623, 84 S. E. 569, L. R. A. 1915E, 145, is relied upon to justify it. It will be observed from an examination of the instruction given in this case that it does tell the jury that the punitive damages allowed, if they are of opinion to allow any, are to be in addition to the compensatory damages; and, again, in the instruction they are told that they may give such punitive damages as further damages, clearly to our mind conveying the impression to the jury that, in case they were of opinion to give punitive damages, the same would be in addition to the compensatory damages to which they might find the plaintiff entitled. The instruction given and approved in the case of Turk v. Ry. Co., supra, did not use this language. The giving of punitive damages, as we have repeatedly held, is a matter purely discretionary with the jury. Even though the case may be one loudly calling for punishment, the jury may deny punitive or exemplary damages. As we have said in other cases, all damages are punitive so far as the defendant is concerned. He gets nothing of substance in exchange for the recovery against him, and when the jury are awarding damages for the purpose of punishment it must be borne in mind that the plaintiff is receiving something to which he is not entitled. This is the basis of the rule established in this jurisdiction that no more damages in the aggregate can be awarded in a case like this than will be sufficient to accomplish the purpose of punishment, when the compensatory damages are found to be insufficient for that purpose.

[2] An instruction should not be given which, in effect, tells the jury that if they find damages by way of punishment they may add the same to the amount found by them as compensatory damages, and return a verdict for the aggregate amount. This would be punishing the defendant twice for the same thing. We are of opinion that this instruction is amenable to the criticism made against it by the defendants, and that the court erred in giving the same.

[3] Instruction No. 2 offered by the defendants, and refused, is:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the words complained of were the result of passion, and were used while the parties were engaged in a heated altercation, or quarrel, and if they further believe that in this quarrel May H. Fisher was provoked to use the words complained of by insulting language addressed to her by the plaintiff Cora E. Fisher, then these facts shall be taken into consideration by you in arriving at your verdict."

It will be observed that this instruction directed the jury to take into consideration any provocation the defendant May Fisher may have had when she used the words complained of because of offensive language used to her by the plaintiff. It is not contended that this is not a correct proposition of law. There is no doubt but that in determining the amount of damages to which a plaintiff is entitled in a suit like this the jury may consider the provocation under which the defendant used the words resulting from offensive language used by the plaintiff. Alderson v. Kahle, 73 W. Va. 690, 80 S. E. 1109, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1198, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 561. It is said, however, that this instruction is covered by instruction No. 1 given on behalf of the defendants, and in a measure this is true; but instruction No. 1 was given upon the theory of justification of the defendants, and not upon the theory of mitigation, while instruction No. 2 is based upon the idea that these things may be considered to mitigate the damages. In this view both instructions should have been given. The jury did not consider the facts proven by the defendant as sufficient for justification, but if this instruction No. 2 had been given they might have considerably mitigated the damages because of the plaintiff's conduct.

It results from what we have said that the judgment will be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 4, 1921.)

1. Deeds ⇨54—Not effectual to vest title until delivered.

An instrument purporting to be a deed for land, though duly signed and acknowledged by the grantor and by him caused to be recorded, is not effectual to vest title in the grantee unless and until it is delivered to him by the grantor.

2. Deeds ⇨56(1)—Actual or constructive delivery will vest title.

The delivery may be actual or constructive, and, if either, the title in the land conveyed will vest in the grantee.

3. Deeds ⇨194(1)—Facts concerning execution and record, particularly grantor's admissions, may warrant presumption of intended delivery.

The facts directly or collaterally connected with the signing, acknowledgment, and recordation of an instrument purporting to be a deed for land may in some circumstances warrant the presumption of an intent on the part of the grantor to deliver the deed, especially so when they are reinforced by the admission of the grantor of the grantee's rights under the conveyance.

4. Deeds ⇨194(1)—Facts sufficient to warrant presumption of delivery stated.

Among such circumstances are the execution of a deed by the grantor to his son, including its acknowledgment and delivery for record, its retention by the recording officer for a long period of years, the grantee having died in the meantime, the grantor's avowed purpose being to induce the son to abandon employment elsewhere and return to the land, improve and cultivate it for the common benefit of both parties thereto, and the response of the son to the inducement, his return to and improvement and cultivation of the land, the erection by both of a residence on the land and its occupancy by the grantee for many years, in this instance 15, though not consecutive, with the apparent knowledge and acquiescence of the father, recordation of the deed, and his expressed recognition of the grantee's rights under the conveyance.

5. Deeds ⇨208(6)—Facts held to indicate grantor's intention to deliver and grantee's intention to accept conveyance.

The acts of a grantor, a father, in the execution and recordation of a deed, purporting to vest in the grantee, his son, without his knowledge, title to an undivided moiety of land for the avowed purpose of inducing the grantee, then employed elsewhere, to return to the land, improve and cultivate it, and the acts of the grantee in reliance upon such inducement, considered together, disclose an intention on the part of the grantor to deliver, and upon the part of the grantee to accept the conveyance.

6. Deeds ⇨194(1)—Presumption of constructive delivery is not conclusive.

The presumption of constructive delivery of such an instrument is not conclusive, but may be rebutted by evidence showing either nondelivery by the grantor or nonacceptance by the grantee.

7. Deeds ⇨194(1)—Grantor must rebut presumption of delivery.

To rebut such presumption, and it may be rebutted, the burden rests upon the grantor; but to have that effect the proof must be certain, competent, and demonstrative.

8. Witnesses ⇨159(8)—Grantor may not testify to deceased grantee's repudiation of conveyance.

The grantor is not competent, according to section 23, c. 130, Code (sec. 4879), to prove repudiation of the conveyance by the grantee; he being dead when the testimony is given.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Action by Austin Downs against Effa L. Downs and others. From a decree canceling deed as a cloud on plaintiff's title, the defendants appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

J. O. Wilcox and John J. Ingle, both of West Union, for appellants.

J. V. Blair, of West Union, for appellee.

LYNCH, J. The decree reviewed upon this appeal canceled a deed as a cloud upon plaintiff's title to an undivided moiety of a tract of 100 acres of land owned by plaintiff in Doddridge county, on which he has resided since he acquired it by purchase in 1877. The grantee, John S. Downs, is his son, and the defendants are the son's widow and heirs at law, he having died intestate before the institution of this suit.

The deed bears the date of September 27, 1893, as do also the certificate of acknowledgment and the memorandum of the clerk admitting it to record in the proper office of Doddridge county. If it lacked anything essential to complete the conveyance, it was the failure to deliver it then or afterward, directly or constructively, to the grantee. Whether it was or was not delivered in either manner is, as we apprehend, the chief question to be solved upon this investigation; and its proper solution depends upon the following facts and circumstances:

As appears from the face of the deed, the consideration for the conveyance was $400, one-half of it cash, the receipt of which is therein acknowledged, and two notes in equal amounts, payable in 6 and 12 months, with interest, were given for the residue and payment secured by a lien retained in the deed. The grantee was not present at any time during the execution of the deed and its delivery to the clerk for recordation on the same day. As at that time he was, and theretofore had been, in Marion county, he could not then have paid the $200 receipted for or executed the notes described in the deed. It seems clear, at least the plausible inference is, that he had no knowledge or information of his father's intention to convey him an interest in the land until some time after the execution and recordation of the deed; the interval being of brief duration. So that, if the son did pay any part of the consideration in cash and execute notes for the residue, he did neither on the date of the deed, but may have done so either before or afterwards. The plaintiff and J. V. Blair, who as an attorney at law prepared it and the notes, and as a notary public certified the acknowledgment, were the only persons present at the time of the execution of the instrument, and they and the clerk when it was delivered to the latter for recordation.

The deed remained in the office of the clerk of the county court of Doddridge county from the time it was delivered to him until its redelivery, May 8, 1919, to the plaintiff accompanied by Blair as his counsel, and the notes in the possession of the plaintiff from the date of their preparation until they were exhibited with the bill without alteration or change in form or appearance and with no signature thereto affixed. Plaintiff and Blair identified them as the notes he had prepared for the grantee's signature.

The bill charges and plaintiff testifies that his son, the grantee, when informed of the action taken, repudiated it, refused to pay the consideration for the conveyance, or any part of it, and to obligate himself to comply with any of the terms thereby imposed, and ever thereafter continued so to refuse. These allegations as to the repudiation of the transaction, and refusal to comply with the terms proffered, the adult defendants in their answers deny, and during the taking of the depositions questioned by objections the competency of the plaintiff to relate the details of any conversation had between him and the grantee, who had died prior to the date of the father's examination as a witness in his own behalf. According to the recitals of the decree the cause came on to be heard upon these objections as also upon the matters therein specified; yet the decree is silent as to any ruling thereon. In such a case the legal inference is that the court deemed the objections unfounded and so treated them. But the evidence objected to clearly comes within the express inhibition of section 23 of chapter 130 Code (sec. 4879), and not within its exception; and, as defendants still rely on the challenge for incompetency in this and other like instances, such testimony is disregarded upon this inquiry.

The purpose of the conveyance, as plaintiff himself has informed us, was to induce his son to abandon employment elsewhere and to reside upon the farm and assist in its management, control, and cultivation for the joint benefit of himself and the father's family. This design he conceived apparently without previous consultation with the son, and, as the context shows, in the absence of the latter. So far as disclosed, the son was not aware of the father's intention or purpose until after the execution of the deed.

There is some diversity of opinion as to the age of John S. Downs when the deed was made. He married the defendant Effa L. Downs August 17, 1894, less than a year after the date of the deed, and in the license his age is given as 23. But so far as it affects the merits of the controversy it matters not how old he was when the deed was executed. Soon after the marriage, however, he and his wife moved into the residence of his father, and he and they continued to occupy it jointly, just how long does not appear, but probably until the grantee with the aid and assistance of the father erected on the land a residence for the son, into which he moved and which he occupied for a period of about 5 consecutive years when he moved to Wetzel county, and later again to the residence so erected by him and his father, where he remained for several years, the combined periods of his occupancy being about 15 years. The record does not furnish accurate data as to the changes of residence to and from the land and none as to the cause therefor, or whether the father acquiesced in the son's absence during each interim. There is some testimony tending to show friction between them at the time the son finally left the premises, a few years before his death.

If the reason for the conveyance was to induce the son to occupy the land, and he did occupy, cultivate, improve, and keep it in a state of repair, as the testimony of competent disinterested witnesses shows the fact to be, he did what plaintiff contemplated when he executed the deed. The occupancy was not that of a tenant paying rent, it was not merely permissive or by sufferance, as we may presume in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

[1, 2] The execution of the deed by the father and the entry of the son into possession of the land virtually were contemporaneous acts. Both participated in the fruits of the common enterprise, the cultivation of the land. They jointly erected the residence occupied by the son. To the possession and utilization of the land by the son the father did not object, but concurred for 15 years or more. His acquiescence is significant and tends to show his intention to convey, and the son's intention to accept the conveyance. Acceptance is as essential to the validity of a deed as delivery, Campbell v. Fox, 68 W. Va. 484, 69 S. E. 1007. Delivery of a deed implies its acceptance by the grantee except in the case of fraud, artifice, or imposition. 18 C. J. 212, 213, cases cited in note 64. If the deed is in due form, and the grantor has signed and acknowledged it for record, its manual delivery is not essential to an acceptance by the grantee, as a constructive delivery is sufficient.

[3, 4] Whatever suffices to raise a fair and reasonable presumption of an acceptance implies delivery. 18 C. J. 416. In other words, they are so related that each necessarily implies the other, when the circumstances are such as to warrant the implication and there is absent any act or conduct of the parties involving in doubt and uncertainty their intention as to either of these essential requirements. What they have said and done is to be weighed and considered in order to ascertain their intention and purpose regarding the title which the deed purports to vest in the grantee. The grantor deliberately and voluntarily caused the deed to be prepared, his acknowledgment certified, and the instrument recorded nearly 26 years before plaintiff sued for its cancellation. Professedly his purpose was to induce exactly what ensued, his son's return to the place of his birth and adolescence, the cultivation, repair, and improvement of the homestead. This purpose he accomplished, and the son by entering upon and remaining on the land during many years, though not continuously, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the father, indicated an intention on his part to accept the benefit of the conveyance. Such an entry by the grantee "into possession of the land is a circumstance tending to show a delivery of the deed, and in connection with other circumstances may be strong evidence of delivery." 2 Jones, Law of Real Property, §§ 1220, 1227. Recordation of the deed by the procurement of the father and its prolonged lodgment in the office of the recording officer without being recalled by the grantor until after the death of the grantee, including possession, improvement, and the joint enjoyment of the beneficial results are such additional circumstances as bring the case within the rule stated by the author. Hammell v. Hammell, 19 Ohio, 17; Kearny v. Jeffries, 48 Miss. 343, 359.

Although necessary to the effectiveness of a deed, acceptance need not be express, it may be implied, if the facts connected with the transaction and the acts done apparently in accord with the intention of the parties to the conveyance are sufficient to warrant the implication. Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 461, 19 S. E. 874. In Williams

v. Williams, 148 Ill. 426, 36 N. E. 104, decided a few months earlier than the case last cited, and on the facts somewhat like these now before us, the Illinois court said:

"If a grantor, with or without any previous arrangement with the grantee, executes a deed, and has it recorded, and notifies the grantee, who, by words or acts, accepts the conveyance, the delivery is sufficient, as the actual possession of the instrument is not indispensable."

The court also considered as significant the entry of the grantee upon the land, clearing it, repairing fences, setting out fruit trees, and the exercise by him of other like acts indicative of ownership. The facts in the Williams Case and in Kingsbury v. Burnside, 58 Ill. 810, 11 Am. Rep. 67, decided by the same court, were similar, the opinion in the former citing and being predicated upon the latter.

[8] Besides, the acknowledgment of a deed is in itself some manifestation of an intention to deliver it (Ferguson v. Bond, 39 W. Va. 561, 566, 20 S. E. 591); and its recordation tends strongly to indicate a purpose on the part of the grantor to deliver it, and when the grantee enters on the land conveyed the presumption is still stronger (Com. v. Selden, 5 Munf. [Va.] 160). Moreover, John S. Downs could as a matter of right have obtained possession of the deed while it remained in the clerk's office had he deemed its possession necessary to perfect his title or protect his ownership; for, "after being so recorded, such writing may be delivered to the party entitled to claim under the same." Section 7, c. 73, Code (sec. 3810).

Recordation is the equivalent of a notice of an intention on the part of the grantor to part with his title and vest it in another and thereby publicly warn prospective purchasers and his creditors, if any he has, that he has divested himself of the title and thereby of his land.

[6, 7] The presumption of a constructive delivery of a deed is not conclusive, but may be rebutted by evidence showing either non-delivery by the grantor or nonacceptance by the grantee. To escape the operative effect of the conveyance manually or constructively delivered or actually or constructively accepted, the burden rests upon the grantor or those who claim under him or whose rights are jeopardized by the conveyance to prove the fact to be as he or they allege. In order to entitle such person to the relief he seeks, the proof must be certain or reasonably conclusive. Chambers v. Chambers, 227 Mo. 262, 127 S. W. 86, 137 Am. St. Rep. 567. But the most potent and corroborative fact upon the question of delivery and acceptance is the admission of the plaintiff himself, as established by the uncontradicted testimony of Thaddeus L. Curry, to the effect that plaintiff had conveyed an interest in the land to his son John.

[8] In his bill and in the proof introduced by him plaintiff undertook to show noncompliance by the son with the terms of the deed when the depositions were taken, and as the testimony related to conversations between them the inhibition of section 23, c. 130, Code (sec. 4879), applies. What Mrs. Austin Downs said, though frank, proves nothing helpful to the plaintiff, and consisted only in an assurance on the part of the son that the land would not be sold while she lived. To that extent she recognized the son's right to sell the land, a right as to the exercise of which she seems to have been solicitous. So that, if she was competent to testify because she did not join plaintiff in the execution of the deed, her testimony does not affect the rights of the defendants. The latter invoked the aid of the statute cited by objections, and by submitting the question of competency to the determination of the court as appears from the decree. But the court either advisedly or inadvertently disregarded the challenge. However, defendants still persist in having that question determined upon this appeal. It is too plain to need the citation of authority, as the statute furnishes its own interpretation.

The only other proof that tends to disclose an intention on the part of the grantee to repudiate the deed and a purpose to reinvest the title in plaintiff was to the effect that he refused to accept half of the rental accruing on an oil and gas lease executed by the father alone on the land; the amount so due having been deposited in a Salem bank. The substance of this testimony was that the father urged upon the son the necessity of going to the bank to obtain the money, as it was deposited to their joint credit and neither could withdraw it without the consent of the other. The son went as requested, but refused to accept any part of the money as a matter of right, but finally consented to do so as a gift upon the insistence of the father. This testimony corroborated by competent witnesses is like a two-edged sword in that it cuts both ways, as will readily appear. The fact most relied on, however, is that the son told the father "to bring the papers up and he would sign them; and what was down there was his and he wouldn't bother him any more." None of the witnesses so testifying, it seems, knew to what papers they referred or what they had in mind by the allusion "down there" unless they meant the land. These statements do not deserve much if any consideration viewed in the light of the condition obtaining when the conversation occurred, as it did on the way home.

It is only necessary to refer to two other grounds urged upon our attention. One is the assessment of the land for taxation and the payment of taxes so assessed; the other the refusal of John S. Downs to sign a paper having for its purpose a ratification of the oil and gas lease just mentioned. Plaintiff always paid the taxes charged against the land, although part of the time after the deed was made the assessment was in the joint names of both parties to the deed. How this fact affects the right of either is not apparent. It is a mere circumstance, which, without explanation or connection with the issue raised by the pleadings and proof, amounts to nothing, the only charge being that plaintiff paid the taxes and fraudulently caused the assessment to be changed from their joint names to his own, and this allegation no proof supports. John S. Downs did perhaps refuse to ratify the lease, and it soon afterwards lapsed, for what reason does not appear. He may have thought its execution unwise or an unnecessary and unprofitable incumbrance upon the land.

Whether he paid or did not pay for the moiety conveyed to him no competent testimony tends in any degree to show, except that, if he complied with the deed, he did so either before or after its recordation. That he did so before is not probable, though he may have done so afterwards, or he and his father may have made some other or different arrangement as to payment. Defendants allege, but offer no evidence to show, an indebtedness due from the father to him in excess of the consideration stipulated in the deed. Plaintiff was not competent as a witness to prove nonpayment, as that would be in derogation of the statute cited, so that the only proof of the nonpayment of the consideration is the failure to make the cash payment and execute the notes at the time the deed was made and recorded. What may have occurred afterwards the record does not disclose. That plaintiff remained silent so many years and took no steps toward the cancellation of the deed until after the grantee had died and no longer able to protect himself and family certainly is a circumstance replete with significance. It is without explanation except by the mere assertion that defendants had set up a claim to a half interest in the land after the grantee's death. The grantee had persisted in his right to such an interest while he lived, and that right the father never controverted, so far as we are advised.

Besides, if plaintiff has not received the consideration specified in the deed, and not lost his right to enforce payment thereof, he may still be entitled to it. But that relief he has not asked, and his right thereto we do not adjudge. Nor is weight to be given to the failure to proceed against the interest of the decedent in the 100 acres to satisfy his debts and liabilities in the suit brought for that purpose, because that fact in itself is not sufficiently important to warrant cancellation of the deed.

Our conclusion, therefore, is to reverse the decree and dismiss the bill.

BOBBS v. MORGANTOWN PRESS CO.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 11, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Master and servant — 258(8)—Allegation of unlawful employment held sufficient.

A count in a declaration for personal injuries, based on negligence in employing a girl between the ages of 14 and 16 years to work in a gainful occupation without first having obtained a work permit, as required by sections 3 and 4 of chapter 17, Acts 1919, is not bad on demurrer, for failure to allege in terms that such unlawful employment was the natural and proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries.

Case certified from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Suit by Mildred Bobbs, by, etc., against the Morgantown Press Company, for personal injuries. Demurrer to third count of declaration sustained and at plaintiff's request and on its own motion the circuit court certified the case for review. Demurrer overruled, and case remanded.

Moreland & Guy, of Morgantown, for plaintiff.

Glasscock & Glasscock, of Morgantown, for defendant.

LIVELY, J. Having sustained a demurrer to the third count in the declaration, the circuit court, at the request of plaintiff and on its own motion, has certified its ruling to this court for review.

The count alleges that the defendant owned and operated a printing shop containing such machinery and equipment as is usually found in such establishments, including a platen printing press operated by electricity, and the operation of which required great skill and experience in the operator in order to avoid being injured; that the plaintiff was a child between the ages of 14 and 16 years; and that defendant unlawfully, carelessly, and negligently employed her to work in such establishment, the same being a gainful business or occupation, without having first procured a work permit from the superintendent of schools of the city or county, or from some person authorized by him in writing, and with having failed to keep such permit on file and accessible to officers charged with the enforcement of sections 3 and 4 of chapter 17, Acts 1919 (the Child Labor Law), by reason of which unlawful acts, negligence, and carelessness of defendant the right hand of plaintiff was caught in the machinery, a printing press at which she was working by order of defendant, and mutilated and mangled, causing the loss of three fingers thereof, to her damage of $10,000. The count also avers, for reasons therein stated, that defendant is not entitled to protection under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The grounds of the demurrer are: (1) That it fails to aver a cause of action; (2) it fails to allege any specific act of negligence; (3) it fails to show that the unlawful employment was the proximate cause of the injury. The controlling question here presented is whether the employment of a child between the ages of 14 and 16 years in a gainful occupation, without first having obtained the work permit from the authorities designated by statute, is prima facie negligence of the employer sufficient to sustain an action for damages resulting from an injury to the child arising out of and in the course of the employment.

In the cases which have been considered by this court, where the employment in a coal mine was of a minor under the age fixed by the statute, making it unlawful to employ such minor (12 years of age, afterwards raised to 14 years of age), we have decided that the unlawfulness of the employment and subsequent injury of the employee resulting from and in the course of the employment make out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the employer. Norman v. Coal Co., 68 W. Va. 405, 69 S. E. 857, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 504; Daniel v. Big Sandy Coal & Coke Co., 68 W. Va. 491, 69 S. E. 993; Blankenship v. Coal Co., 69 W. Va. 74, 70 S. E. 863; Dickinson v. Stuart Colliery Co., 71 W. Va. 325, 76 S. E. 654, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 335; Griffith v. American Coal Co., 75 W. Va. 686, 84 S. E. 621, L. R. A. 1915F, 808; and Mangus v. Coal Co., 87 W. Va. 718, 105 S. E. 909. These cases hold, following the Norman Case, that the violation of the statute is rightly considered the proximate cause of an injury which is the natural, probable, and anticipated consequence of the employment; that the infant does not assume the risks incident thereto, including the risk of injury by a fellow servant, and that the defense of contributory negligence could only be asserted where the injury is such as could not reasonably be anticipated as a probable consequence of the nonobservance of the statute; and to avail the employer as a defense it must be shown, not only that such contributory negligence was not such as the statute was intended to provide against, but that the infant was possessed of such wisdom, experience, and sagacity as to take him out of the class of boys under the prohibited age which the statute was intended to protect. This leading case, Norman v. Coal Co., was decided by a divided court, on the point in question here (the unlawful employment and consequent injury constituting a prima facie case of negligence), and the conclusion was in the affirmative; Judges Brannon and Williams holding that inquiry as to the boy's capacity was immaterial, and that contributory negligence would not avail as a defense. This question again arose on a count in the Daniel Case, supra, and also in the Griffith Case, supra, where the first point in the syllabus is:

"A count in a declaration for personal injuries, based on negligence in employing a boy under 14 years of age in a coal mine, inhibited by statute, is not bad on demurrer, for failure to allege in terms that such illegal employment was the natural and proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. It is prima facie negligence to so employ an infant within the prohibited age."

The question also arose in Mangus v. Coal Co., supra, where it was held:

"Injury of the employee in the course of his employment in such case makes out a prima facie case of injury to him by negligence on the part of the employer"—citing the Norman Case.

We can see no difference in principle in the statute prohibiting the employment of boys in a coal mine, and that under consideration prohibiting the employment of children between the ages of 14 and 16 years in gainful occupations, without the permit directed to be obtained by the employer and kept on file, under sections 3 and 4 of chapter 17, Acts 1919. The evils resulting from child labor have become so apparent and glaring in recent years that the public conscience has been awakened, and there has been an insistent demand for its prevention or strict regulation, resulting in the enactment of federal and state laws. The law under consideration is a result. It is the duty of the courts to effectuate its beneficent purpose. The work permit can be issued only upon proof of the intent of the prospective employer that he will legally employ the child, strict proof of age, a certificate of a public health physician or a public school physician, specifying what, in the opinion of such physician, is the physical age of the child, proof of sufficient schooling, and proof that the child has reached the normal development of a child of its age, is in sound health, and physically able to be employed in the intended occupation.

The state has this power of legislation for its own preservation, and for the protection of the lives, persons, health, and morals of its future citizens. The design of the Legislature is apparent. The fitness of the child for the contemplated employment is not left to the judgment or cupidity of the employer, nor to the parents or those in loco parentis, whose judgment is often warped by necessity or inclination. It is to be determined by unbiased agencies, in order that the life, limb, and health of the child may be conserved. The employment of a child in a gainful occupation without such permit is as much of a violation as the employment of the child under the age prohibited by the statute. The object of each is the same. The principle accentuated in our decisions above cited controls here. We therefore conclude that the employment of such child without the work permit, and the subsequent injury in the course of the employment, makes a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the employer. To overcome this prima facie presumption of negligence, the burden is incumbent upon the defendant. Defendant asserts that the defense of contributory negligence is open to it, and therefore the count should specifically allege that the unlawful employment was the proximate cause, or make such allegations as would negative that defense. We have the pleading before us only, and cannot anticipate the evidence, or the defense. The count is sufficient to show prima facie negligence.

There are many recent decisions to the effect that failure to perform a statutory duty is negligence per se, and many others to the effect that such failure constitutes prima facie negligence. They can be found in L. R. A. 1915E, note, page 506, to Conway v. Monidah Trust (Montana). The case of Miller Mfg. Co. v. Loving, 125 Va. 255, 99 S. E. 591, holds that the employment of an infant between the ages of 14 and 16 years, without the work certificate provided for in the statute, creates the same presumption for unfitness for the employment as the statute prohibiting the employment of an infant under the age of 14 years. Other cases holding that the employment of children under certain ages without first obtaining certificates required by the statute is prima facie negligence in case of injury to the child are: Kircher v. Iron Clad Mfg. Co., 134 App. Div. 144, 118 N. Y. Supp. 823; Fraser v. Baker, 137 Ill. App. 588; Stetz v. Boot & Shoe Co., 163 Wis. 151, 156 N. W. 971, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 675; Perry v. Tozer 90 Minn. 431, 97 N. W. 137, 101 Am. St. Rep. 416.

In our opinion the third count in the declaration sufficiently states a prima facie case of negligence, and we so answer the question certified.

Demurrer overruled; case remanded.

INTERSTATE COAL CO., Inc. v. EATON, RHODES & CO.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)1. Judicial sales  $\Leftrightarrow$  54—Rights of purchasers stated.

While a purchaser at a judicial sale cannot take advantage of mistakes whereby obligations of which he had notice were omitted from the decree, the court will correct the inadvertencies to require him to perform contracts of which he had notice, but not to impose additional obligations never assumed.

2. Judicial sales  $\Leftrightarrow$  54—Imposition upon purchaser of contract not assumed erroneous.

Where coal properties operated by receivers were ordered sold pursuant to an offer to purchase, and neither the offer nor the decree referred to certain contracts for the delivery of coke to a third party, it was error to impose upon the purchaser the burden of complying with such contracts; the purchaser never having expressly or impliedly assumed them.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Suit by Eaton, Rhodes & Co. against the Interstate Coal Company, Inc. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and petition dismissed.

Morison, Morison & Robertson, of Bristol, for appellant.

Moulinier, Bettman & Hunt, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and Morton & Parker, of Appalachia, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. The properties of the Empire Coal Land Corporation were sold to the Interstate Coal Company, Inc., the appellant in a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage, by decree of September 9, 1916. At the time of this sale and for some time theretofore, the properties had been operated by a receiver appointed in that suit, who had entered into a contract spoken of as contract 807—A, which provided for the sale and shipment of the entire production of coke by the receiver for the residue of the year 1915, with a minimum of 4,000 tons, for 3,000 tons per month for the first six months of 1916, subject to certain terms and conditions governing the shipments, and also gave to the party not in default the privilege of cancellation of the unshipped portion of any month's quota, the price being $2.25 per ton of 2,000 pounds. George L. Carter, who was the owner of a large number of bonds of the Empire Coal Land Corporation, objected to this contract, and made a motion to set aside the order approving it. On January 11, 1916, the court overruled this motion of Carter, again ratified that contract, and in addition thereto approved another contract between the receiver and the appellees, dated December 31, 1915, designated as contract 843—A. This contract provided for the delivery by the receiver of 6,000 tons, at $2.60 per ton of 2,000 pounds, shipments to be 1,000 tons per month over the first half of the year 1916, subject to certain terms and conditions, among which was a provision that the party not in default had the option of canceling any unshipped portion of a month's quota by giving notice in writing to the party in default on or before the 10th of the following month, and that in the absence of such notice the unshipped portion of any month's quota was to be shipped immediately after the date fixed for expiration of the contract, unless some other date should be agreed upon.

The parties proceeded under these contracts, and neither appears to have demanded strict performance thereof, so that, while for one month there was a small overshipment, for most of the time the minimum quantities required by these contracts were not shipped. It is observed that under both contracts, by their terms, the shipments were to be during the first half of 1916. Thereafter, in July, August, and September, 1916, small quantities of coke were shipped, apparently under the contracts, but much less than the minimum monthly quantities thereby required. There was an interview between the receiver and the representative of the appellee, after July 1, 1916, from which it may be concluded that the receiver agreed to continue to sell and ship under those contracts. Whether this created a new contract or not is one of the questions raised. If it was a new contract, it was made by the receiver without authority, for it was apparently never reported to the court or approved. In our view of the case, it is unnecessary to determine this question. The receiver had also made contracts with Rogers, Brown & Co. and American Locomotive Company for the sale and shipment of 3,000 tons of coke per month, covering the last half of 1916.

This being the general situation on the 28th day of July, 1916, the special commissioners advised the court that they were in a position to effect a private sale of all of the property of every class and kind belonging to the Empire Coal Land Corporation, or to the receivers or receiver in the cause, at the price of $425,000, to the Interstate Coal Company, Inc., upon terms and conditions which were fully set forth in the offer filed with their report. That offer in writing was clear and definite, provided for cash or its equivalent, for the payment of taxes, costs, etc., to be ascertained as of September 1, 1916, for the assumption of a certain vendor's lien, to be deducted from the specified purchase price, and covered other details the recital of which is unnecessary.

The seventh clause of this proposition contains a provision to this effect: That, if this offer is accepted, the Interstate Coal Company, Inc., shall, after delivery of possession of the property to it, have the right to mine and ship coal and to manufacture and ship coke from the said premises, to use the timber therefrom in the construction of houses and for any other purposes upon said premises, to use the said premises, operate the mines now opened thereon, and to open and operate new mines, or lease the same or any part thereof for mining purposes, and to dispose of any machinery and equipment until default be made in the payment of the purchase-money notes or any part thereof.

It was thereupon decreed that action upon this report and proposed sale be suspended and held in abeyance until September 1, 1916, for such action thereon at that time as might to the court appear proper; and the cause was referred to a special commissioner to make report in vacation of the liens, debts, and other equities of said Empire Coal Land Corporation, or the receiver in this cause, M. Zeigler, as well as his predecessors, H. Hardaway and A. K. Morison, receivers, and also of the taxes and indebtedness both of the company and the receivers. Thereafter, on September 9, 1916, by decree drawn with great care and covering 15 printed pages of the record, in which the court apparently undertook to determine every question in the case ready for decision, the bid of appellees was accepted, using this language:

"Upon due consideration, the court is of opinion and finds from the proceedings had in this cause for the sale of the properties herein involved that not more than the sum of $425,000 can be realized from a sale of the same; that it is to the best interest of all the parties concerned that this court decree a sale of the said properties for the sum of $425,000 upon the terms offered by the Interstate Coal Company; and that the said offer of the said Interstate Coal Company be accepted instead of selling the property at public auction.

"Upon due consideration it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the offer of the said Interstate Coal Company for the purchase of the said properties be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and the said Interstate Coal Company is hereby declared to be the purchaser of all the properties of the aforesaid Empire Coal Land Corporation, including the properties owned or acquired by the receivers of this court in this cause, to wit, A. K. Morison and H. Hardaway, or their successor, M. Zeigler, of every class and kind, excepting only moneys, bills and accounts receivable due to the said Empire Coal Land Corporation or to any receivers or receiver in this cause."

Thereupon follows a general enumeration of the property of every class, kind, and description, concluding with clause (d), using this comprehensive and interpretive language:

"Any and all other properties of every class and kind belonging to the said Empire Coal Land Corporation or the receivers in this cause of any character whatsoever not hereinbefore specifically enumerated or preferred to, it being the intention of this decree to sell, transfer, assign, and deliver to the said Interstate Coal Company every class and kind of property, rights, easement or privilege, and all equities of every class and kind owned by the said Empire Coal Land Corporation or by the receivers in this cause except such properties, real, personal, or mixed, as may be in the hands of R. S. Graham, the trustee in bankruptcy, and except moneys, bills, and accounts receivable in the hands of R. T. Irvine and D. D. Hull, Jr., special commissioners in this cause."

And these provisions are followed by this language:

"This sale is made subject to the contracts made by Zeigler, receiver, for the sale to Rogers, Brown & Co. of 2,000 tons per month of standard 48-hour furnace coke for the last half of 1916, at the price of $2.50 per ton net f. o. b. ovens, to be shipped to Hanging Rock Iron Company, Hanging Rock, Ohio, and for the sale of the requirements of American Locomotive Company during last half of 1916, not to exceed a maximum of 1,000 tons of 72-hour foundry coke at the price of $5.25 per ton f. o. b. Richmond, Va. For all shipments made upon said contract after September 2, 1916, payment thereafter shall be made to Interstate Coal Company."

Thereafter, on January 19, 1917, the appellees filed their petition, asking for a correction of the decree of sale, to which petition the appellant objected, and the court entered a decree thereon in which this language is used:

"* * * It appearing from the argument of counsel that the said petitioners are apprehensive that said decree of sale, by reason of express mention of the contracts with the Rogers, Brown & Co. and the American Locomotive Company, intended to and did exclude the contracts made by the receiver with said petitioners, the court hereby declares that no such exclusion was intended in said decree, and that the intention of said decree was that the Interstate Coal Company took the properties sold by the commissioners subject to all valid contracts entered into by the receiver and subsisting and enforceable at the time of said decree; that nothing contained in said decree nor in this order shall be construed as a finding or determination as to whether or not said contracts with the said petitioners were subsisting and enforceable contracts at the date of said decree; that, the court having construed said decree of sale, entered on September 9, 1916, so as to remove said apprehension of the petitioners, no further ruling upon said petition is necessary, and it is therefore dismissed."

In the meantime, before this decree was entered, the purchaser had repudiated the two contracts for the shipment of coke to the appellees, designated as 807-A and 843-A, hereinbefore referred to.

fore us until May, 1918, when the appellees filed their petition upon which the decree appealed from is based. The substance of that petition is the allegation that the appellant company purchased and holds the property of the Empire Coal Land Corporation, subject to the condition that it fulfill and completely perform said contracts by shipping the remaining undelivered tonnage of coke at the prices fixed therein, and that it has failed and refused to fulfill and perform said contracts, and that, notwithstanding such failure and refusal, it continues to hold, operate, and take the benefits of the said properties purchased by it under the decree of September 9, 1916; and they pray that a decree of specific performance be entered against the appellant, requiring it to perform specifically said contracts by shipping at once, in accordance with shipping orders of appellees, the remaining undelivered tonnage of coke as aforesaid, or that, by reason of the breach of said condition of purchase, the sale of said Empire Coal Land Corporation properties be set aside, canceled, and annulled, and that the appellant be required to restore the said properties to the receiver, and that the receiver be required to deliver in accordance with said shipping orders the said unshipped portions of the contracts, etc.

Appellant demurred to the petition, and answered, denying its substantial allegations.

After the taking of testimony, the court on February 15, 1920, entered the decree from which this appeal is taken. This decree grants one of the prayers of the petition, and holds that the Interstate Coal Company purchased the property of the Empire Coal Land Corporation, subject to the performance of all valid contracts theretofore entered into by the receiver, and subsisting and enforceable at the time of the sale, and especially that the two contracts with the appellees were valid and subsisting at the time of the sale, and were enforceable to the extent of the unfulfilled portions thereof, to wit, 2,474.80 tons of coke to be shipped under contract 807—A, and 1,688.10 tons to be shipped under contract 843—A; and inasmuch as it appeared that the purchaser of the properties had not complied with the terms of the sale, in that it had not shipped the coke found to be due under these contracts, it thereupon adjudged:

"That unless the said Interstate Coal Company, within 90 days from the entry of this decree fully comply with the terms of said sale and the decree of this court, heretofore entered, authorizing and confirming the same, by shipping or causing to be shipped, subject to the order of the said petitioners, as provided by and in said contracts, the amount of coke above set forth [specifying it], upon the terms and at the prices respectively provided in said contracts," that the property should be sold by special commissioners named in the decree at the cost of the Interstate Coal Company.

The case then involves the rights and obligations of the appellant, the purchaser under the decree of sale of September 9, 1916, which must be determined from a consideration of the facts recited. It is customary in such decrees for the court fully to protect all of the rights and equities of those who have dealt with the receiver. This is done sometimes by specifically requiring that the purchaser shall assume the obligations of all outstanding contracts with the receiver, and sometimes by providing for the filing of all claims arising thereunder with the court for satisfaction out of the proceeds of the sale thereby brought under the control of the court for distribution. This seems to have been fully realized by those who drew the decree of sale in this case, for it expressly provides that the sale is made subject to the contracts made by the receiver for the sale of coke to Rogers, Brown & Co. and to the American Locomotive Company, such contracts covering the last half of 1916. They were, therefore, current unperformed contracts at the time of the sale. It is noted that the contracts with Eaton, Rhodes & Co. here involved by their express provisions covered the first half of 1916, and therefore according to the record, had expired. This probably explains why they were overlooked, if in fact they were overlooked at that time.

The appellees rely upon the established rule that purchasers at a judicial sale may by summary process be required to perform the contract of sale, and cite many authorities for that proposition. The trial court evidently based its decree upon that undoubted proposition of law, and held that, because of its unquestioned power to require the purchaser to perform the contract of sale, it had authority to enter the decree appealed from. It therefore adjudged that, notwithstanding the fact that the period named for the performance of the contracts here involved had then expired, the purchaser made no reference to them in its offer to buy, and that the decree which accepted his unqualified offer also failed to refer to them, nevertheless they were subsisting contracts which the purchaser assumed, and hence was bound to perform, and that in case of his refusal the entire property should be resold.

[1] We are unable to find anything in the record which justifies this finding of fact. The complete contract for the sale is contained in the written offer of the purchaser and its acceptance in the decree of September 9, 1916. The irresistible conclusion from a consideration of the plain terms of the bid of the purchaser and the decree accepting it is that these contracts of Eaton, Rhodes & Co. were not referred to in the contract of sale, and that the purchaser assumed no obligation whatever with reference thereto. While it is true that a purchaser at a judicial sale cannot take advantage of a mere mistake or inadvertence whereby some obligation of which he had notice or is fairly charged with notice has been omitted from the decree of sale, in such case the court applying equitable doctrines will correct such inadvertencies and inaccuracies, not, however, to do an injustice to the purchaser, nor to require him to perform a contract which he has not engaged to perform, but only for the purpose of requiring him to perform a contract of which he has notice and which in equity and good conscience he ought to perform so as to prevent him from taking an unfair advantage of a mistake to evade the obligation of his contract. Purchasers at judicial sales are not, however, more helpless than others with respect to their contracts, and courts have no authority to impose additional obligations in connection therewith which they have never assumed either in express terms or by necessary implication.

The doctrine governing judicial sales is thus stated in Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Cottrell, 85 Va. 861, 9 S. E. 133, 17 Am. St. Rep. 110:

"Until the sale has been confirmed the proceeding is in fieri; the bidder is not considered as a purchaser, and he is therefore not liable for loss to the property, by fire or otherwise, in the interim, nor is he compellable before confirmation to complete his purchase. But as soon as the sale is absolutely confirmed then the contract becomes complete; the bidder, by the acceptance of his bid, becomes a purchaser—that is to say, the owner of the equitable title in the lien on the property for the unpaid purchase money—and he may be compelled by the process of the court to comply with his contract. 2 Daniell's Chancery Practice (5th Ed.) 1275; Hurt v. Jones, 75 Va. 341; Blossom v. Milwaukee, etc., R. R. Co., 3 Wall. 196.

"It is by no means, therefore, a matter of discretion with the court to rescind a sale which it has once confirmed, nor is the sale to be rescinded for mere inadequacy of price, or for an increase of price alone; but some special ground must be laid, such as fraud, accident, mistake, or misconduct on the part of the purchaser, or other person connected with the sale, which has worked injustice to the party complaining. After confirmation, the purchaser at a judicial sale is as much entitled to the benefit of his purchase as a purchaser in pais, and the sale in the one case can be set aside only on such grounds as would be sufficient in the other. There is no principle upon which any distinction between the two classes of cases can be drawn. * * *

In Sloss Iron, etc., Co. v. South Carolina, etc., R. Co., 85 Fed. 133, 29 C. C. A. 50, 42 U. S. App. 748, it appeared that the receivers of a railroad had made a contract with a coal company for a year's supply of coal, with the option on the part of the coal company of renewing the contract. The foreclosure purchasers, who had knowledge of the contract and of the date of its termination, but not of the option clause, received coal under the contract until notified by the coal company of its intention to renew it at the expiration of the year. It was held that the purchasing company was not bound by the option clause of the contract.

In Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. King, 74 Ark. 366, 85 S. W. 1131, it was held that a statute providing that whenever any railroad company, corporation, individual, or individuals shall purchase any railroad from any other railroad company, corporation, individual, or individuals, the purchaser shall take and hold the same subject to all debts, liabilities, and obligations of the company from which said road was purchased, etc., does not apply to the sale of railroad properties by foreclosure, and that the purchaser at such sale takes the property freed from the debts, liabilities, and contracts of the mortgagor, except such as were prior liens, and such as the court may have provided for in its decree of foreclosure. 6 Ann. Cas. 86.

There are many cases in which the power, right, and duty of chancery courts to supervise sales ordered by their decrees and to protect the parties from all fraud, mistake, unfairness, and imposition by setting aside such sales is recognized. Indeed, it may be said that, for the prevention of fraud and imposition, the rule is universally recognized as applicable to such sales. Those cases, however, have no relation to a case like this where there is an absence of any fraud, collusion, misrepresentation, or inadequacy of price. In re First Trust & Savings Bank of Billings, 45 Mont. 89, 122 Pac. 561, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1334.

In Houston & Texas Cent. R. Co. v. Crawford, 88 Tex. 277, 31 S. W. 176, 28 L. R. A. 761, 53 Am. St. Rep. 752, it appeared that the railroad property there sold was delivered by a receiver to a purchaser subject to the payment of some claims against the receiver, which might be established before the court which appointed him within a reasonable time, and it was held that an action against the receiver brought in another court for personal injuries within the limited time was not binding upon the purchaser because it was not presented, as required by the decree, to the court entering the decree and having control of the assets arising from the sale of the property; and this is there said:

"As a general rule, the purchaser of a railroad at a sale made under an order of the court holding the custody of the property by a receiver takes the property free from claims against the receiver arising out of the operation of the road; but the court ordering the sale may impose upon the purchaser liability for such debts, as a part of the consideration of his purchase. Hicks v. International & G. N. R. Co., 62 Tex. 41; Beach, Receivers, § 735. A purchaser under such order can only be held liable according to its terms. In this case the order directing that possession be delivered to the purchaser prescribed that he should take the property subject to the payment of such claims against the receiver as might be established before that court within a given time. This was a condition of liability, and the purchaser cannot be held by virtue of the order alone, except for the claims so ascertained and allowed. * * * It follows that the purchaser cannot be held in this case under the orders of the court; the plaintiff not having presented his claim in accordance with the orders imposing the liability."

That this is the general rule is assumed in Olcott v. Headrick, 141 U. S. 543, 12 Sup. Ct. 81, 35 L. Ed. 851. There, while the decree of sale provided that the purchaser should pay demands which were presented within six months, and that demands which were not presented within six months after confirmation of the sale should be barred, when the court came to confirm the sale, the decree of confirmation contained no such limitation as to time, and it was held that, inasmuch as the decree of confirmation which the purchaser accepted did not create that limitation, it did not exist, and he was held liable for a claim which was presented about eight months thereafter. In that connection it was said:

"If the purchasers had objected to the decree of confirmation because it destroyed the six months' limitation, they could either have asked the court not to insert such a provision, and, on its refusal, have appealed to this court, or have declined to be bound by the sale, on the ground that the new terms varied from those contained in the decree of sale."

The purchaser was held liable only because of the terms of the decree of confirmation.

[2] So that, as we view this case, it is clear that, whatever equities there may be in favor of appellees, there is no ground either upon reason or authority for imposing the burden thereof upon the purchaser of the properties of the Empire Coal Land Corporation. It is entitled to the benefit of the contract of sale and to hold the property in accordance with its terms. Under the circumstances of this case the court exceeded its power when it undertook to impose additional burdens which were not imposed by the contract itself, and which, by fair construction of its language, were excluded therefrom. It may be that, if the purchaser had been notified that the assumption of these contracts was required, it would have modified its bid for the property so as to provide therefor; and it is noted in this connection that the decree which accepted the bid adjudged it to be in every respect sufficient.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the purchaser has not failed in any respect to comply with all of the terms of its contract of purchase, so far as this record discloses, and therefore that the decree which adjudged otherwise is erroneous.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary in this case to consider the other questions which the record presents—such, for instance, as the suggestion that for breach of a contract for the delivery of personal property which is a common article of merchandise, such as coke is, the remedy is the recovery of the pecuniary damage sustained, and never specific performance, and further that the petition, which asks for specific performance of these contracts, was not filed for more than a year after their alleged breach, and it appears that in the interval the price of coke had risen from $2.60 a ton to $7 a ton.

For the reasons indicated, the decree complained of will be reversed, and the petition on which it is based will be dismissed.

Reversed.

APPALACHIAN POWER CO. v. TOWN OF PULASKI.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Electricity ⚡—Municipality and lighting company may amend franchise by agreement without additional consideration.

Municipal authorities and an electric lighting and power company may by agreement amend an ordinance conferring a franchise on the company and reduce the maximum rate thereby authorized, and no further consideration to the company would be needed other than the continuing privilege of conducting its business under the ordinance.

2. Electricity ⚡—Lighting company held authorized to reduce rates without consent of municipality.

Where an electric light and power company is operating under a franchise fixing a maximum rate, the company may, without the consent of the town, establish a schedule of reduced rates and make them effective.

3. Electricity ⚡—Burden upon municipality to show that lighting company's franchise had been amended.

Where a town claimed that the franchise of an electric light and power company had been amended by resolution, so as to reduce rates, the burden of proof was upon the town.

4. Electricity ⚡—Lighting company's franchise cannot be amended without consent of both parties.

Like other contracts, a franchise of an electric light and power company cannot be amended without the consent of both the municipality and the company.

5. Electricity ⚡—Lighting company's franchise held not amended by consent.

Where an electric light and power company, operating under a franchise fixing a maximum rate, proposed to the municipality to reduce the rate, and the municipality by resolution agreed thereto, such acts did not constitute an amendment of the original ordinance, prohibiting an increase in rates, the company not having known of or consented to such amendment.

6. Electricity — 4—Amendment of franchise held not ratified by lighting company.

Where an electric light and power company operating under franchise proposed to the municipality to establish a schedule of reduced rates, and the municipality agreed thereto by resolution, held that by charging the rates so fixed the company did not thereby ratify or approve the claimed amendment of the franchise by the passage of the later resolution; the company having the right to reduce rates without the municipality's consent.

Error to Circuit Court, Pulaski County.

Petition by the Town of Pulaski for a writ of mandamus against the Appalachian Power Company. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant brings error. Reversed and dismissed.

R. E. Scott, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

H. C. Gilmer, of Pulaski, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. The essential facts out of which this controversy arises are these: On March 18, 1911, the council of the town of Pulaski granted a franchise to the Appalachian Power Company, whereby the power company, a public service corporation, entered into a contract to furnish electric light and power to consumers in the town, upon conditions expressed in the ordinance. The only clause of the franchise here involved is section 7, which reads thus:

"The meter rates charged by the —, its successors or assigns, for domestic and commercial lighting shall not exceed ten (10) cents per kilowatt hour, and the rates charged for power shall not exceed the rates charged in other places by said —, its successors or assigns for similar service under like condition as to cost of supply."

On August 12, 1911, the council received by mail the paper signed in type "Appalachian Power Company," which is embodied in the ordinance of August 15, 1911, reading thus:

"Pulaski, Va., August 15, 1911.

"Council met in special meeting this 15th day of August, 1911, at 4 p. m. Present: John T. Loving, Mayor & Councilman, Dr. O. G. Painter, John W. Eckman, Robert Bunts, J. H. Ratcliffe, J. W. Holmes and J. Smith. The meeting was called to order by the mayor, who explained that it was called for the purpose of receiving and considering a new schedule of rates for supplying the light consumers of the town with electric current offered by the Appalachian Power Company submitted August 12, 1911, which read as follows, to wit:

"To the Honorable Mayor and Council, Town of Pulaski, Va.

"The Appalachian Power Company respectfully requests you to grant them permission to change the rates for lighting as specified in their franchise, substituting therefor the following:

"Schedule for Lighting Rates.

"First 15 KWH at 10 cents each.

"Next 85 KWH at 8 cents each.

"All over 100 KWH at 6 cents each.

"5 per cent. discount allowed for payment on or before the tenth of month in which bills are issued.

"This request is made for the following reasons: There appears at present to be some misunderstanding as to how the rate now in effect should be figured. When the sliding scale rate is used it is contended that the rate is slightly in advance over the former one and when the overlapping method is used an extreme unfairness results, as a consumer using 99 KWH pays considerably more than one consuming 101 KWH.

"Furthermore, the Appalachian Power Company desires to put in effect similar rates throughout all its properties, and this proposed rate is one already in use at Bluefield and several of the other plants.

"With the new rate in effect a fairer charge may be made to all consumers and a slight reduction will result in the majority of the bills.

"Respectfully,

"Appalachian Power Company."

"After duly considering the proposition as set forth by the Appalachian Power Company it was moved and seconded and unanimously carried that the old rate for furnishing electric current to town consumers as agreed upon by council and said company be rescinded, and that the schedules presented by said company as of August 15, 1911, be adopted instead as set forth by them and made a part of this record to govern future charges by said company for electric lights."

Thereafter the rates therein named were made effective, and so continued until the company, on August 12, 1919, filed its schedule of higher rates to become effective September 15, 1919. This schedule reads thus:

"The State Corporation Commission of Virginia.

"Appalachian Power Company.

"Residence and Commercial Lighting Rate.

"Schedule B-6.

"Applicable to all consumers served in the state of Virginia.

"Rate:

"First 50 KWH per month at 10 cents per KWH.

"Next 250 KWH per month at 8 cents per KWH.

"Next 300 KWH per month at 7 cents per KWH.

"All over 600 KWH per month at 6 cents per KWH.

"Minimum charge seventy-five (75) cents per month.

"Discount of 5 per cent. bills are paid on or before the 10th of the month following that in which service is rendered.

"Reconnection charge one dollar ($1.00).

"By R. E. Scott, Attorney."

The town thereupon filed its petition for mandamus against the company, claiming that by virtue of the action of the council on August 15, 1911, in response to the request for permission to change the rate authorized by section 7 of the original ordinance, that section of the original ordinance had been rescinded, and that the rates fixed on August 15, 1911, controlled the company and constituted the contract rates under the franchise which could not be exceeded. The petition prayed for a mandamus requiring the company to observe these rates.

The answer of the company, on the other hand, claimed that section 7 of the original ordinance had never been amended, and that by authority of that franchise the company had full power to charge reasonable lighting rates to consumers in the town of Pulaski within the limits fixed by the original ordinance—that is, not in excess of 10 cents per kilowatt hour—that if the action of the council on August 11, 1911, was intended by the council to operate as a rescission of section 7 and as an amendment of the original franchise, such a result had never been intended or contemplated by the company, and that the ordinance of 1911 so relied upon by the town had never been communicated to the company or accepted by it as an amendment of the franchise, and that no one had ever been authorized by it to propose any amendment of the original franchise.

At the meeting in August, 1911, G. C. Wilder, then district manager of the Appalachian Power Company in the district of which the town of Pulaski formed a part, appeared and requested action on the communication referred to. Wilder was succeeded as district manager two days later by one R. L. Pierce, on August 17, 1911, who was then told by Wilder that he had attended a council meeting on August 15, and shown the communication which he said he had written to the mayor and the town council on August 12, asking permission to change the rates for lighting, and that the council had given their permission for the change. At this time one M. Kahn was the general manager of the company, and H. M. Byllesby & Co., of Chicago, acting under the control of the board of directors, were in charge of the company. On August 22, 1911, Kahn, the general manager, reported to Byllesby & Co., which report, so far as is pertinent, reads thus:

"Mr. Arthur S. Huey, Vice President, H. M. Byllesby & Company, Chicago, Ill.—Dear Sir: I herewith submit a report of our operations for the week ending Friday, August 18, 1911.

"Matters of Interest.

"We have taken up with the mayor and the city council the matter of changing the Pulaski lighting rates to our Bluefield rates, which we have adopted as standard throughout this district, and the mayor and city council have agreed to same. The Pulaski franchise can remain undisturbed, for it merely recites that the maximum rate chargeable shall be 10c per K. W. H. and under this schedule our maximum rate is 10c with a 5 per cent. discount."

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement, showing what the testimony of the witnesses would be, and among the uncontradicted statements are these: That the business of the power company was, in 1911, conducted by M. Kahn, general manager, and G. C. Wilder, district manager; that Wilder was under the control of the general manager, who in turn was under the control of H. M. Byllesby & Co., of Chicago, acting under the control of the board of directors; that the manager of H. M. Byllesby & Co. and other officers of the company had no knowledge of the communication of August 12, 1911; that the ordinance of August 15, 1911, of the town of Pulaski was never communicated to the other officers of the company; that its existence was unknown to them; and that no authority was ever conferred upon any agent of the company to apply for or to accept any amendment to the franchise.

The trial court granted the prayer of the petition, and awarded the mandamus prohibiting the proposed increases in the rates, and a writ of error has been allowed to that order.

[1] The question presented by these facts is a very narrow one. It is in fact freely conceded that unless section 7 of the original ordinance has been amended by the resolution of August 15, 1911, then the company is within its rights in making the proposed increase of 1919 effective. It cannot be fairly doubted, we think, that the municipal authorities and the company could, by agreement, amend the ordinance and reduce the maximum rate thereby authorized, and no further or additional consideration to the company would be needed to support such an amendment other than the continuing privilege during the term of the ordinance to conduct its business thereunder. We have, however, a statute (Code 1919, § 3022), which it would be necessary to pursue if it were proposed to increase the rates authorized by such a franchise, but this statute would not preclude a decrease of such rates by mutual agreement.

[2] No sufficient reason appears for the request which was filed by Wilder for leave to establish the rates named in the application of August 12, 1911. It is perfectly manifest that the company had the right to make them effective without the consent of the town, for they were well within the maximum rate expressly authorized by section 7 of the original franchise. That the maximum rate authorized by the franchise was not either the rate then charged or referred to is perfectly apparent from the document, which contains this language:

"This request is made for the following reasons. There appears at present to be some misunderstanding as to how the rate now in effect should be figured. When the sliding scale rate is used it is contended that the rate is slightly in advance over the former one, and when the overlapping method is used an extreme unfairness results, as a consumer using 90 KWH pays considerably more than one consuming 101 KWH."

The language just quoted is inapplicable, untrue, and meaningless if the company at that time had in effect a flat 10 cent rate per kilowatt hour. It is hence clearly inferable therefrom that on August 12, 1911, the company had in effect a varying scale of lighting rates within the maximum authorized by the franchise, and did not have in effect a flat rate of 10 cents per kilowatt hour, because manifestly if such a flat rate had been then in effect, there could have been no misunderstanding as to how the rate should be figured, nor could there have been any question as to a sliding scale rate, or a calculation of rates by the overlapping method; nor could there have been any extreme unfairness existing between a customer who used 90 KWH and one who used 101 KWH. This consideration leads us to the suggestion, at least, that what was intended by that application was to change the sliding scale rates which were then being charged, and that it was not thereby intended to affect the maximum rate authorized by the franchise which had been agreed to within the six months previous. It is not in accord with the customs of business that either the company or the municipal authorities would without legal advice have taken action intended thus radically to modify or rescind section 7 of the franchise so recently adopted, and, if acting upon legal advice, it is inconceivable to us that the action taken would have been so informal in its character and so doubtful in its import. We cannot readily credit the view that the municipal authorities would have accepted a typewritten signature of the company from the district manager as an application to modify and change the franchise, without any communication whatever with either the general manager at Bluefield, or with the officials or the agents in control of the company at Chicago.

All this is fully recognized by the learned counsel for the town, and to overcome the significance of these circumstances he rests his argument largely upon the letter of M. Kahn, general manager at Bluefield, to Bylesby & Co., at Chicago, of August 17, 1911, hereinbefore quoted, and he argues that this shows that both Kahn, the general manager, and Bylesby & Co. were thereby notified of the proceedings in the city council, and should be charged with notice of the contents of the resolution of the council of August 15, 1911, although the letter makes no reference to any resolution. Its language is that—

"We have taken up with the mayor and city council the matter of changing the Pulaaki lighting rates to our Bluefield rates, which we have adopted as standard throughout this district, and the mayor and city council have agreed to same."

Inasmuch as under section 7 of the original franchise the company had the clear right to make its Pulaaki rates conform to the Bluefield rates so long as they did not exceed the maximum fixed by the franchise, there is nothing in this language which can be fairly construed as notice that any proposition had been by anybody made to rescind section 7 of the franchise. The succeeding sentence in the letter makes it absolutely certain that neither Kahn, the general manager at Bluefield, nor Bylesby & Co., at Chicago, had the slightest intimation of such a proposed rescission or any intention to consent thereto, for it reads thus:

"The Pulaaki franchise can remain undisturbed, for it merely recites that the maximum rate chargeable shall be 10c per K. W. H. and under this schedule our maximum rate is 10c with a 5 per cent. discount."

[3-5] The crucial inquiry in the case is whether or not section 7 of the franchise has been rescinded and the rates named in the communication of August 12, 1911, substituted therefor. This being claimed by the town, the burden is upon it to show that the franchise contract has thus been amended. Like other contracts a franchise of this character cannot be amended without the consent of both contracting parties. Whatever the intent of the city council by its resolution of August 15, 1911, that intent cannot operate to amend the contract except by agreement with the company. There is no evidence in the record in conflict with that which we have recited to show that the minds of the contracting parties ever met upon this alleged amendment, or concurred therein, and the resolution was never communicated either to the general manager or any other person authorized to act for the company.

[6] It is claimed, however, that the company should be held to have ratified and approved the amendment of its franchise, because from 1911 to 1919 it has charged and accepted the rates fixed by the resolution of the council of August 15, 1911. Of course there can be no doubt about the fact that a company may estop itself by its conduct from making a claim which is inconsistent therewith, and it is unnecessary to cite pertinent cases. There has, however, been no conduct of the company here which is inconsistent with its claim to be conducting its business in the town of Pulaski by virtue of its original franchise. The rates charged since August, 1912, as well as the proposed increases therein specified in the schedule which was filed in 1919, are both well within the maximum limit fixed by the original franchise. There is nothing requiring explanation in the conduct of the company, acting upon the letter of August 22, 1911, when it is so apparent that the general manager at Bluefield then understood and wrote to Byllesby & Co. that the Pulaski franchise would remain undisturbed. That letter, as well as every subsequent act of the company shown by this record, is entirely consistent with its present claim here, namely, that none of its officials ever had any authority to consent to any modification of that franchise, and that none of them has ever so consented. There is evidence that the new proposed rates correspond with the rates for lighting elsewhere, and that the old rates had not yielded a rate sufficient to pay fixed charges of the company, and that the rates complained of are less than the service is fairly and reasonably worth, as well as less than fair, just and adequate. These questions, however, are referred to in the record only in general terms. The town is claiming that the company is bound by its franchise contract not to increase the rates referred to in the resolution of August 15, 1911, whether the rates be adequate or inadequate, and as to this, the chief and main contention, we are clearly of opinion that the trial court erred in its judgment. Our conclusion is that section 7 of the original contract authorizing a maximum lighting rate of 10 cents per kilowatt hour is still in effect and has never been amended or rescinded in the only possible way in which such amendment or rescission can be accomplished, that is, by the mutual agreement of the municipal authorities with the company.

For the reasons indicated, the order will be reversed, and the petition for mandamus dismissed.

Reversed.

LAMP et al. v. LOCKE et al. (No. 4271.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 4, 1921.)

1. Injunction ¶5—Mandatory injunction given only where right is clear and necessity urgent.

Relief by mandatory injunction will be given only where the right of the applicant is clear and the necessity urgent.

2. Injunction ¶5—Will lie to compel drilling of offset well where parties conspire to defeat plaintiff's right to royalties.

Such remedy will be awarded where there is a collusive agreement between a lessor and lessees of a tract of gas-producing land whereby the gas therein is being extracted and exhausted by a well five feet distant from the boundary line, and on an adjoining tract under lease and control of the parties to such collusive agreement, with the intended result that the plaintiff, who is a joint owner of one-half of the gas royalty in the first-named tract, is prevented from receiving any royalty therefrom, to his irreparable loss, especially where his right to such royalty has a time limit which will expire within one year. In such case a mandatory injunction will lie to compel the drilling of an offset well.

3. Equity ¶129, 132—Bill need not follow statutory form, and is not demurrable for indefiniteness as to parties if naming them with their interests in subject-matter and relief sought.

It is not essential that a bill in chancery shall follow the form given in section 37, c. 125, of the Code; a substantial compliance therewith is sufficient, and, if the bill in any of its parts names the parties thereto, their interest in the subject-matter, and relief sought, it is not demurrable for indefiniteness as to parties.

4. Equity ¶244—It is not error to require defendant to answer within a reasonable time after overruling demurrer to bill.

A defendant may appear and demur to a bill before it has matured for hearing, and, if he does so and the demurrer be overruled, it is not error to then require him to answer within a reasonable time.

5. Appeal and error ¶238(7)—Ruling on demurrer reviewed without motion to correct judgment, but not errors in decree after demurrer overruled.

"If a defendant in a bill files no plea or answer, but files a demurrer, simply on the ground that the plaintiff on the facts stated in the bill is entitled to no relief against him, and the court below overrules such demurrer and awards a rule against him to answer the bill at a specified time, and he fails to do so, and a decree is rendered against him, and he makes no such motion to have it reversed or corrected in the court below, and he appeals from such decree, solely on the ground that the court rendered any sort of a decree against him, this court will, though he did not make such motion, entertain his appeal, because such appeal though in form an appeal from the last decree, is in substance and in reality an appeal from the decree overruling his demurrer, and deciding that the plaintiff was entitled to relief on the statements in the bill against him, and is therefore not to be regarded as a decree on a bill taken for confessed. But, if the appellant in such case does not confine his appeal to the error committed by the court in overruling his demurrer simply carried out in the last decree, but insists that there are in addition thereto other and independent errors in the last de-decree against him, which should be reversed, even though the appellate court held that the demurrer was properly overruled, this court will not entertain such appeal, because, so far as these additional and independent errors are concerned, this last decree is to be regarded as a decree on a bill taken for confessed, and cannot be reversed by this court till a motion to correct it has been made in the court below." Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pleasants County.

Action by Julia Israel Lamp and others against John T. Locke and others. From a decree awarding plaintiff a mandatory injunction and another decree refusing to reverse the first decree for alleged errors, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William Beard, of Parkersburg, for appellants.

Frank J. Barron and G. D. Smith, both of St. Marys, for appellees.

LIVELY, J. From two decrees of the circuit court, one entered on the 14th of September, 1920, awarding to the plaintiff a mandatory injunction, and the other entered on the 2d day of December, 1920, refusing to reverse the first-named decree for alleged errors therein, some of the defendants prosecute this appeal.

The bill prays for a mandatory injunction against defendants compelling them to drill an offset well on what is known as the W. P. Jones 68-acre farm to protect the gas thereunder from depletion through another well within 5 feet of the dividing line between the W. P. Jones farm and located on another tract of 64 acres known as the C. A. Jones lease. The bill was filed August rules, 1920, and afterwards notice was served on defendants notifying them that on the 23d day of August, 1920, plaintiffs would move for a mandatory injunction, compelling them to drill an offset well on the W. P. Jones farm of 68 acres to protect drainage from a well they had drilled within a few feet of the boundary line, on the C. A. Jones lease. A. S. McCullough, J. T. Locke, Dan H. Reynolds, and Addie L. Reynolds, appeared specially by William Beard, solicitor, to the notice and objected to the granting of the injunction because the bill was not sufficient in law to entitle the plaintiffs to the relief prayed for. The court overruled the demurrer and gave defendants 10 days to answer, who by counsel in open court then declined to make further answer. The motion was docketed and the hearing continued until the 3d day of September following, on which day, the defendants making no appearance and failing to answer, the court continued the hearing of the motion until its next term, to wit, the 14th day of that month, because the bill was not then matured at rules for hearing.

On the 14th of September, 1920, the bill having regularly matured for hearing, and no further appearance being made by defendants, the cause was heard upon the bill, exhibits, decree nisi, and the motion for the mandatory injunction, the affidavits filed in support thereof, and upon the proceedings theretofore had, the bill was taken for confessed as to the defendants, and the court entered the decree complained of against the defendants, the owners, lessees, and those who were in possession of the W. P. Jones 68-acre leasehold and in possession and ownership of the C. A. Jones 62-acre leasehold, commanding them to sink an offset well on the W. P. Jones lease to and through the oil and gas bearing sand found in that vicinity to sufficient depth to counteract and offset a gas well upon the C. A. Jones 62-acre leasehold, then producing gas, with privilege of inspection and measurement of the well, at its completion, to plaintiffs, and required them, the plaintiffs, to execute an injunction bond. Afterwards the defendants who had appeared and demurred to the bill on August 23d and other defendants, namely, Frank H. Cox, S. V. Riggs, C. P. Simonton, Alva McCullough, R. E. Hays, Albert Neely, the Pleasants County Bank, and Benwood Oil Company, gave notice to plaintiffs that they would move the court on a certain day for reversal of the decree of September 14, and dissolution of the injunction awarded thereby, stating the grounds on which the motion would be made. This motion was heard and overruled, on December 2, 1920.

Plaintiffs are heirs at law of J. L. Israel, who died intestate in 1913, and they aver that J. L. Israel on October 24, 1907, conveyed to A. N. Riggs a tract of 68 acres of land, known and designated as the W. P. Jones lease, for the sum of \$1,400, and in the granting clause thereof made the following provision: "Reserving therefrom  $\frac{1}{16}$  royalty in all minerals produced from said farm for a period of 15 years from this date"—that on the same day said Riggs conveyed the same tract of land to W. P. Jones, in the granting clause of which he used these words: "Reserving therefrom one-sixteenth royalty in all minerals produced from said farm for a period of 15 years from this date, second party to use due diligence to have said land tested for oil, the aforesaid reservation of mineral rights is to recover reservation made by J. L. Israel and wife in deed made by them to A. N. Riggs of October 24, 1907"—that in 1915 defendant W. P. Jones leased said tract of land for oil and gas purposes to the defendant J. T. Locke, who associated with himself other named defendants in a mining company known as the Jones Farm Oil Company, and he and his associates in the year 1917 drilled on the W. P. Jones farm a small oil-producing well and paid to plaintiffs about \$100 as their one-sixteenth part of the royalty. The royalty provided for in the lease was one-eighth part of the oil and one-eighth of all gas produced and sold from the farm for each year so long as the gas is sold therefrom and payable quarterly when marketed. The bill avers that no further development has been made on the W. P. Jones lease, and further avers that defendant C. A. Jones, who is known as Cordelia Jones, the mother of defendant W. P. Jones, owns a tract of 62 acres adjoining the 68-acre W. P. Jones lease, and in the year 1915 also made and executed an oil and gas lease to defendant Locke on her 62-acre tract, who associated with himself certain other defendants, naming them, and also a number of the defendants associated with him in the Jones Farm Oil Company, as a mining company known as the Locke Gas Company, and proceeded to sink a well on the C. A. Jones 62-acre tract within 5 feet of the dividing line between the W. P. Jones farm and the C. A. Jones farm, which well is a good gas producer, averaging a daily production of about 1,000,000 feet, and through which, by means of its close proximity to the dividing line, the gas which underlies the W. P. Jones lease, in which plaintiffs are interested to the extent of one-sixteenth of such gas, is being rapidly drained and exhausted, to the great detriment and damage of plaintiffs' interest therein. The bill charges on information and belief that W. P. Jones and his mother, C. A. Jones, combined and conspired with Locke and the other defendants, who composed the Locke Gas Company, to drill the C. A. Jones well within 5 feet of the dividing line with the intent to draw the gas underlying the W. P. Jones 68-acre lease in order to do, as they have thereby done, irreparable injury and damage to the plaintiffs, and that the well was so located at the behest and request of W. P. Jones in order that he and his mother would be the real beneficiaries in the royalty from said well and thus drain the W. P. Jones lease without paying plaintiffs the one-sixteenth royalty therein to which they were entitled. The bill alleges refusal on the part of defendants, after request, to drill an offset well on the W. P. Jones tract of 68 acres to protect the depletion of the gas therefrom, that plaintiffs have no adequate relief save in a court of equity, that they are suffering irreparable loss, that large quantities of gas are being taken from them without payment of their royalty, and they pray for a mandatory injunction to compel defendants to drill an offset well, and for general relief.

The deeds and leases are filed as exhibits with the bill. To support the application for mandatory injunction, two affidavits are filed by plaintiff, one sworn to by W. L. Israel, one of the plaintiffs, to the effect that the well complained of is producing a large amount of gas in paying quantities and was drilled in in February, 1918, and is located within 5 feet of the dividing line between the two farms, the other by D. L. McCullough, who has no interest in the litigation, to the effect that he was present when the well complained of was located by W. P. Jones and certain of the other defendants, and who stated that the well was to their knowledge very close to the W. P. Jones dividing line; that the well was drilled in in February, 1918, was gauged at over 1,000,000 feet, and that he was afterwards informed by A. S. McCullough that the first check received by the company, the Locke Gas Company, from the Hope Natural Gas Company from the first sale of gas was over $900. The principal ground of error is predicated on the insufficiency of the bill, and on this assignment the case turns. For that reason the allegations of the bill have been set out at more length than usual.

Is the bill sufficient? It is contended that plaintiffs do not have such an interest in the gas under the 68-acre W. P. Jones tract as will entitle them to an action for protection, and we are cited to Feather v. Baird, 85 W. Va. 267, 102 S. E. 294. That decision holds that, where a deed grants all the right, title and interest in and to minerals in a certain tract for a valuable consideration, a covenant on the part of the grantee to pay one cent royalty per ton on all coal mined, payable as soon as the coal is mined and shipped, was not a condition subsequent, but only an additional consideration for the grant, which the vendee was bound to pay. The grantor conveyed all his title to the coal, but retained an interest therein, enforceable when the coal was mined, which the grantee was obligated to pay. The Israel deed expressly "reserves from the grant one-sixteenth royalty in all minerals produced from said farm for a period of 15 years from this date," and conveys the land and minerals with this incumbrance on the minerals. The grantee does not bind himself to pay except by implication. If, perchance, he should extract the mineral, he would be required to pay the reserved one-sixteenth royalty. Any one holding under him either by purchase or lease, and extracting the mineral, would be likewise bound. But whether this clause should be construed as a retention of a part of the mineral in place, or whether in the nature of the usual covenant for payment of royalty in mining leases, or whether as an additional consideration for the grant, it is immaterial to inquire for the proper disposition of this case. It is plain that the vendor has a property right expressly reserved to him in the conveyance of which all subsequent purchasers or lessees are bound to take notice. Whether plaintiffs can protect this property right by mandatory injunction is the vital inquiry. On the same day this deed was made to Riggs (October 24, 1907) the latter made conveyance of the same land (acknowledging before the same notary) to defendant W. P. Jones, expressly referring to the Israel deed therein, Jones assuming the payment to Israel of the purchase money as the consideration for the grant, and in the granting clause used the following language:

"Reserving therefrom one-sixteenth royalty in all mineral produced from the said farm for a period of 15 years from this date, second party to use due diligence to have land tested for oil, the aforesaid reservation of mineral rights being made to cover the reservation made by J. L. Israel and Margaret Israel, his wife, in the deed made by them to A. N. Riggs bearing date October 24, 1907, the said party of the first part hereby conveying to said party of the second part all rights of every kind and character conveyed to the said A. N. Riggs by J. L. Israel and Margaret Israel, his wife, in the deed aforesaid."

Defendant W. P. Jones and his lessees were fully aware of Israel's interest in the mineral, and assumed the obligation to pay his royalty reserved in case the minerals were removed by them. It is argued by counsel for appellants that Israel, in order to protect his reservation, should have expressly reserved a vendor's lien in the face of his deed as for a balance of purchase money. Unquestionably, no. Indicative of the knowledge of Israel's reservation and vested right, defendant Jones and his lessees with whom he formed a mining partnership to exploit the farm for oil and gas in the year 1917 drilled a producing oil well on the farm, and, recognizing plaintiffs' interest in the oil produced, paid to them their one-sixteenth royalty, amounting to about $100, and continued to pay royalties to them. So states the bill and it is not controverted.

[6]. The construction placed upon the meaning of any instrument or any part thereof by the parties thereto is entitled to great weight, and is often conclusive. Lovett v. W. Va. Central Gas Co., 73 W. Va. 40, 79 S. E. 1007; 13 C. J. p. 546.

[1, 2] Courts are extremely cautious in considering applications for and awarding mandatory injunction, and a clear right must be shown, and the case be one of necessity or extreme hardship. Powhatan C. & C. Co. v. Ritz, 60 W. Va. 395, 56 S. E. 257, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1225. But the power to grant is undoubted, and, if it were not so, the remedial and restraining power of courts of equity would be greatly impaired, if not partially destroyed. Does the bill set up a case of necessity or extreme hardship? Plaintiffs' right to royalty in the W. P. Jones tract is rapidly nearing extinguishment by the expiration of the 15-year period; and by conspiracy defendants have caused a cessation of development thereon for the purpose of destroying their right, and at the same time are appropriating a part of it through a well on adjoining property. Coupled with this fleeting right of plaintiffs is the uncertainty of damages in an action at law. Under the circumstances an action at law would be inadequate, and the delay practically a denial of justice. From the peculiar characteristics of oil and gas in place, their elusive and migratory nature, their tendency to find an escape in the direction of least resistance, how far they will travel under given pressure to find an escape has been found entirely too problematical for any degree of certainty. In practical experience no one will approximate with reasonable certainty, and experts widely differ. Damages in such cases are largely speculative and uncertain. The true measure is most difficult to find. A remedy at law is not adequate, in the sense to deprive equity of jurisdiction, unless it is as certain, prompt, and efficient to the ends of justice as the remedy in equity. Besides, fraud and collusion are charged, always elements of equitable jurisdiction. It is clear that an injunction will not lie against the defendants composing the mining company owning the C. A. Jones lease from developing their property. Archer on Oil & Gas, p. 782. Neither would an action at law lie against those members solely interested in that lease.

As above stated, W. P. Jones and his lessees had notice of plaintiffs' royalty in the 68-acre tract. In the operation and development it is their duty to protect plaintiffs' interest, not to destroy it. The principle of law expressed in the Latin maxim applies, "Sit utere tuo et alienum non lœdas," meaning, "So use your own property as not to injure or destroy the property of another." There was an implied covenant when they leased this property that they would, having full knowledge and notice, protect plaintiffs' rights reserved, and pay them one-sixteenth royalty on all mineral taken therefrom. These plaintiffs, under the facts, are entitled to the same protection of their royalty interest as their co-owner of the royalties, W. P. Jones. When the lessee of oil and gas lands begins exploration, there is an implied covenant that he will diligently proceed, and, if oil or gas is found, he will protect the lines and develop the property. Archer on Oil and Gas, p. 393. But Jones has conspired with his lessees to take the gas out by a well on an adjoining tract. He has procured this to be done for apparent reasons. The bill charges that he induced his lessees so to act. It is well settled that Jones could compel his lessees to build an offset well to protect his royalty. Cannot plaintiffs, co-owners of the royalties, demand and receive the same protection, especially when their right will soon expire? A lessee in the operation of his lease must act in good faith. Where he owns adjoining land, he has no right, under the guise of ownership, to drain the land leased by putting down wells on the adjoining property, without sinking offset wells on the lease sufficient to protect it from such drainage, when the lessor is entitled to royalties in the oil or gas taken from the leased premises. Thornton on Oil & Gas (3d Ed.) § 108. A lessee of two or more adjoining tracts cannot collusively, fraudulently, or evasively drill wells on one tract so as to drain the oil from the adjoining tracts, and equity will furnish relief to those injured thereby. Barnard v. Monongahela Gas Co., 216 Pa. 362, 65 Atl. 801; Kleppner v. Lemon, 176 Pa. 502, 35 Atl. 109. In this last case the defendant was required to sink an offset well forthwith, under penalty of forfeiture. See, also, Jennings v. Carbon Co., 73 W. Va. 217, 80 S. E. 368. A decree of forfeiture cannot be given plaintiffs. They are not parties to the lease; and a forfeiture or abandonment would, as a practical result, extinguish their right, already nearly lost by flight of time, and would perpetuate the very condition brought about by the collusion of defendants—depletion of the gas through adjacent wells. Under the allegations of the bill charging fraud and collusion, justice would not permit a forfeiture or an abandonment of the W. P. Jones lease. Then what adequate remedy remains except through mandatory process of a court of equity? We think that the facts alleged, with the necessary inferences therefrom, are sufficient to justify such remedy, unusual and harsh though it may be. The case is one of necessity and extreme hardship.

[7, 8] Appellants urge that the demurrer (termed an objection to the granting of the mandatory injunction) should have been sustained because there is no allegation in the bill that the oil well on the W. P. Jones tract was not a sufficient offset to protect drainage from the well near the dividing line; that it is not averred therein with precision that there is sufficient territory in the W. P. Jones tract underlaid with sand from which the said well obtains its gas, and that the nature of the sand is such as to allow drainage; that it was error for the court to read ex parte affidavits submitted to sustain the motion for injunction; and that such affidavits, when read, did not supply adequate proof to sustain the decree of September 14, 1920. The only well on the W. P. Jones tract is alleged to be an oil well, how far away from the C. A. Jones lease does not appear, but the bill states facts which lead to the conclusion that the gas in large volume is being drawn from the W. P. Jones land without adequate protection to plaintiffs' interest. The prayer for an offset well negatives the presumption that one is already there. It would be a violent and unreasonable presumption to say that a well of 1,000,000 feet flow, within 5 feet of a tract of land, would not draw gas from that tract. The character of the sand under both tracts would be presumed to be the same. Without an actual test a statement to the contrary would be imaginative. Proofs of the allegations of the bill, duly sworn to, are not necessary upon demurrer, or when their verity is not denied. Affidavits are always proper to sustain a bill for preliminary injunction. The decree is alleged to be erroneous because it gives plaintiffs the privilege of going upon the premises to inspect the drilling of the offset well and to measure its flow when finished. What harm there can be in such a privilege we fail to perceive. It does not vitiate the decree. If it be exercised to the detriment of defendants, the court would remedy that condition when it arises. It is a privilege which fair-minded business dealing would readily accord.

[3] Criticism is directed to the form of the bill. It is claimed that it is not in the form required by section 37, c. 125, of the Code, or in the usual form of chancery practice prior to the enactment of that section, and is therefore fatally defective. A bill is not necessarily defective because it does not follow the form found in the Code. That section expressly says that the bill may be in that form or in the substance thereof. It is not mandatory. The bill, in what purports to be its caption, names each of the plaintiffs and each of the defendants. Then follows the words:

"To the Honorable Homer B. Woods, Judge of the Circuit Court of Pleasants County, West Virginia: The bill of complaint of Julie Israel Lamp et al., plaintiffs, against John T. Locke et al., defendants, filed in your honor's said court at August rules, 1920. The plaintiffs represent and show unto your honor," etc.

In the prayer of the bill all of the defendants are again named as such. While the bill is inaptly drawn, as to the naming of parties, we think it sufficient to show who are the plaintiffs and defendants, their respective interests in the subject-matter, and the relief sought. The criticism is technical.

[4] Further error is asserted because, it is claimed, no proper time was given defendants in which to answer the bill after their appearance on August 23 to the notice for injunction, at which time they objected to the granting of the injunction. The claim is to the effect that the bill had not matured for hearing, and the demurrer interposed to the bill and then overruled would not justify a rule to answer until after the bill had fully matured. The bill is for mandatory injunction only, and defendants were summoned to answer it at August rules, when the bill was filed. The action was pending, and a motion for preliminary injunction could have been made at any time. It could have been made upon presentation of the bill before filing and before process.

"A preliminary injunction is an extraordinary proceeding in which the statute dispenses with some things indispensable in regular proceedings." Cooper v. Bennett, 70 W. Va. 112, 73 S. E. 261, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 851.

The appearance of defendants to resist the motion for injunction was an appearance to the bill, and they were entitled to demur and answer if they deemed it advisable. They waived maturity of the bill.

"A defendant who appears and answers at a term when the cause is improperly on the docket because not set for hearing at rules waives such irregularity." McDermitt v. Newman, 64 W. Va. 195, 61 S. E. 300.

But counsel contends that they did not demur, but simply objected to the granting of the injunction on the preliminary motion thereof, and that the court improperly treated their objection as a demurrer. The record shows that defendants appeared, objected to the granting of the injunction, "and they and each of them say that the plaintiffs' said bill is not sufficient in law to entitle plaintiffs to the relief by injunction prayed for in their said bill." This was clearly a demurrer. The court properly treated it as such. In the subsequent proceedings, and in the petition for appeal, counsel for defendant treats it as a demurrer. Upon overruling the demurrer time was given defendants to answer, and counsel in open court declined to answer, and made no further appearance. The motion for injunction was docketed, and the hearing thereon continued, and no action was taken thereon until after the cause had fully matured. Where a demurrer is argued and overruled, and the demurrant is ruled to answer on a day certain, if on that day he fails to appear and answer, plaintiff is entitled to a decree against him for the relief prayed. Section 30, c. 125, Code. Defendants could have answered at any time before final decree, under section 53 of chapter 125, notwithstanding the court's order giving them 10 days to

[5] Appellees contend that no assignment of error except to the decree overruling the demurrer should be considered as to these defendants who appeared, demurred, and then refused to answer; that they stand in this court upon their demurrer. If an appeal had been taken by them without first making motion under section 5, c. 134, Code, to correct errors, then they could not be heard upon any assignment of error committed after the demurrer was overruled; they would stand upon the questions raised by the demurrer. Steenod's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133; Ferrell v. Camden, 57 W. Va. 401, 50 S. E. 733. But they, as well as their codefendants, have made the motion in the lower court to reverse and correct errors under said section of chapter 134 as to both decrees, and the errors, if any, committed in both decrees will be considered. The rule is stated by Judge Green as follows:

"If a defendant in a bill files no plea or answer, but files a demurrer, simply on the ground that the plaintiff on the facts stated in the bill is entitled to no relief against him, and the court below overrules such demurrer and awards a rule against him to answer the bill at a specified time, and he fails to do so, and a decree is rendered against him, and he makes no such motion to have it reversed or corrected in the court below, and he appeals from such decree, solely on the ground that the court rendered any sort of a decree against him, this court will, though he did not make such motion, entertain his appeal, because such appeal, though in form an appeal from the last decree, is in substance and in reality an appeal from the decree overruling his demurrer and deciding that the plaintiff was entitled to relief on the statements in the bill against him, and is therefore not to be regarded as a decree on a bill taken for confessed. But, if the appellant in such case does not confine his appeal to the error committed by the court in overruling his demurrer simply carried out in the last decree, but insists that there are in addition thereto other and independent errors in the last decree against him, which should be reversed, even though the appellate court held that the demurrer was properly overruled, this court will not entertain such appeal, because so far as these additional and independent errors are concerned, this last decree is to be regarded as a decree on a bill taken for confessed, and cannot be reversed by this court till a motion to correct it has been made in the court below." Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533.

A. N. Riggs has no interest in the litigation and is not a necessary party. He was evidently only an intermediary between J. L. Israel and W. P. Jones in the transfer of the title to the W. P. Jones tract.

We affirm the decrees of September 14, 1920, and of December 2, 1920.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Suit by John S. Farr against J. S. Weaver. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

J. H. Strickling, of Huntington, for appellant.

Marcum & Shepherd, of Huntington, for appellee.

MILLER, J. We settled the principles applicable to this case in response to questions arising upon the pleadings and formerly certified to us by the circuit court. 84 W. Va. 182, 99 S. E. 395.

As shown by the report of that case the suit was to enforce a mechanic's or materialman's lien claimed by plaintiff against defendant's real estate situate in the city of Huntington, amounting as the present record shows to about $1200.00.

It is conceded that plaintiff furnished to Watts-Castle Construction Company, a co-partnership, contractors, who built the house on defendant's lot, the material covered by plaintiff's alleged lien and that the contractors owed him therefor, but as shown in the former and present record, the defendant, on September 11, 1917, while the work of building the house was still in progress, executed to the construction company his note for $1200.00, on account of the labor and material which went into the building, and which note they turned over to the plaintiff, as plaintiff claims, on account of another debt represented by a past due note discounted by him at a bank in Huntington, in which he was a stockholder and director, and payment of which was then being demanded of the makers and endorser by the bank. And it is contended by plaintiff that the payees of the note made particular application thereof to the payment of their past due note.

[1] On the former hearing we distinctly decided that if as pleaded by defendant the Watts-Castle Construction Company received from him the $1200.00 note in part payment for the work and material going into the construction of his house, and plaintiff had notice of such fact, neither he nor the contractors could lawfully make a different application thereof. The evidence taken and considered upon the hearing in the court below, and now before us, shows clearly that plaintiff knew and was bound to know that the note was Weaver's note given to the Watts-Castle Construction Company, and it is admitted that he knew from his books that he had furnished material to these contractors for the construction of the house on defendant's lot. The dray slips, so called, sent out by him with the draymen delivering the material so furnished, showed the time and place of delivery and the name of the owner of the lot. His books of account also indicated where or for whose job the materials were furnished, and as he admitted, it was from these slips and from his books that he afterwards took the items in making up his account and filing his lien against defendant's property. The fact of Farr's knowledge and notice of the source and purpose of the note, we think is fully established by the evidence, and such being the case it was his duty to make the proper application of the note to the discharge of his incipient lien then existing on Weaver's property, and not apply it or allow the contractors to apply it on the old debt and attempt to perpetuate the lien on defendant's property. As suggested in argument, the court below may have been misled by the notion that defendant was bound by the former decision to show actual notice to Farr of the maker's purpose when accepting the note from the contractors. But in equity means of knowledge with the duty of using them are equivalent to knowledge itself, and Farr could not shut his eyes to the facts in his possession, which if pursued would have fully informed him. See the many cases cited for this proposition in 10 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 486. That Farr had actual knowledge is evident from the fact that shortly after receiving Weaver's note he called him up on the telephone to ask him how he stood with the Watts-Castle Construction Company, and being told, he notified Weaver that he proposed to hold him and his property liable for all the material furnished them in the construction of his house. This he could not do without first applying the Weaver note pro tanto to his debt, as in law and equity he was bound to do. If this had been done, plaintiff's lien would have been discharged in full, and he would have had no lien to enforce against Weaver's property.

[2] Another proposition affirmed on the former hearing and become applicable to the case now presented, is that the Watts-Castle Construction Company were the agents of Weaver in the construction of the house on Weaver's lot, and they and Farr were charged with notice that an agent can not lawfully misapply his principal's money in payment of his individual debts. The evidence satisfies us that Farr had knowledge of the financial condition of the contractors and had taken time by the forelock in an effort to cover his probable losses. It was inequitable and unjust for him to have attempted to do so at the expense of Weaver with the knowledge of the facts or means of knowledge at his hands.

For the foregoing reasons we are of opinion to reverse the decree and dismiss the plaintiff's bill with costs to appellant incurred here and in the circuit court,

GOODBAR v. WESTERN & SOUTHERN LIFE INS. CO. (No. 4227.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia,
Oct. 11, 1921.)

1. Insurance  $\S$ 141(2)—Insurer, by unconditional delivery and giving credit for premium, waives policy provision against liability before actual payment.

An express provision in a policy of life insurance that the insurer shall not be liable thereon until the premium is actually paid, may be waived by the unconditional delivery of the policy to the insured as a complete and executed contract under an express or implied agreement to give credit for the premium, or for a part thereof, and in such case the insurer is liable in case of the death of the insured before the expiration of the time given for payment.

2. Insurance  $\S$ 665(6)—Circumstantial evidence to establish suicide must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis.

Where, in a suit on a policy of life insurance, the defendant relies upon a provision of the policy defeating recovery if the insured dies from suicide, while sane or insane, within two years from the date of the policy, the evidence to show that the insured's death was suicidal must be clear and satisfactory, and where circumstantial evidence is relied upon for such purpose, such circumstances must establish that death resulted from suicide to the exclusion of every reasonable hypothesis consistent with death from natural causes.

3. Insurance  $\S$ 291(7)—Life policy held void for insured's misstatement as to previous injury.

A policy of life insurance issued upon an application in which is contained a representation by the insured that he had never had any illness, injury, or disease, will be rendered void upon a showing that the insured, prior to the time of making the application, had suffered an injury resulting in the loss of one of his feet.

4. Insurance  $\S$ 300—Life policy void for misrepresentation in application as to having been refused insurance.

A policy of life insurance issued upon an application in which is contained a representation by the insured that he had never applied to a company or agent for insurance without receiving a policy of the exact kind and amount applied for, will be rendered void, where it is shown that the insured had in fact applied to other companies for life insurance, and that such other companies had refused to issue the same.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Trial  $\S$ 233(1)—Instruction, if defendant failed to establish any of its defenses, verdict must be for plaintiff, held error.

In an action on a life policy, an instruction on false representations in the application held erroneous because telling the jury that, if defendant failed to establish any of its defenses, the verdict must be for the plaintiff, while exactly the reverse of this is true.

6. Insurance  $\S$ 256(2)—Whether insured intended to deceive by false statements of facts is immaterial.

False answers in an application for a life insurance policy as to matters of fact and not of opinion render the policy void, whether applicant had any intention of deceiving or not.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Zorada Goodbar against the Western & Southern Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

Fitzpatrick, Campbell, Brown & Davis, of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

J. H. Strickling and Jean F. Smith, both of Huntington, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. The plaintiff brought this suit to recover the indemnity provided in a policy of insurance issued by the defendant upon the life of her husband, Harry Goodbar. To review a judgment in her favor for the amount of said indemnity this writ of error is prosecuted.

On the 1st day of December, 1913, according to the plaintiff's contention, and on the 1st day of January, 1914, according to the contention of the defendant, Harry Goodbar applied to an agent of the defendant for a policy of life insurance in the sum of $3,000. This application was in writing, and is introduced in evidence in this case. Upon this application the defendant issued the policy of insurance desired, and sent it to its agent at Huntington, who delivered it to the insured. At the time the application was taken Goodbar paid the sum of $5 as an advance on the premium charged, which was $58.80. At the time of the delivery of the policy on the 8th of January, 1914, Goodbar was not able to pay the balance of the premium, and the plaintiff states that the agent accepted another payment of $2, for which a receipt was given, and Goodbar's note or due bill for $51.80, and delivered the policy unconditionally, while the agent swears that he delivered the policy to Goodbar accepting the $2 as a conditional payment, with the understanding that the policy was simply delivered for examination, and would be returned unless the full premium was paid within 30 days, and he says that he took a written statement from the insured showing this fact. This writing, however, is not produced, and the defendant shows that it is unable to locate the same if, indeed, it ever existed. On the 9th of January, 1914, Goodbar became very sick from bichloride of mercury poisoning, presumably taken with suicidal intent, and on the 15th of that month he died as a result thereof. At the time the application for insurance was made, and on the same day, Goodbar was taken before the company's local medical examiner, Dr. Shafer, who examined him and submitted his result of the examination to the company with the application for insurance. This same doctor was called to attend Goodbar in his last illness, and discovering while giving this attention that Goodbar only had one foot, and recalling that this did not appear from the medical examination which he submitted, he told Goodbar that he ought to return the policy of insurance, and have the same corrected so as to show the fact in that respect. Prior to this, however, the agent of the company had come to Goodbar's house to secure the return of the policy. Mrs. Goodbar says that both of these parties represented that it would not affect the validity of the policy in the least, but that they simply wanted it for the purpose of making it speak the truth. The Goodbars refused to return it to the agent, but they did return it to the doctor, and he sent it to the company with the explanation that the insured had only one foot. It never was returned by the company, but a copy was furnished to the plaintiff, upon which this suit was brought.

The defendant interposed to the declaration four defenses. The first asserted that the insured had committed suicide by taking bichloride of mercury within two years of the date of the issuance of the policy, and that because of a provision in the policy to the effect that in case of the suicide of the insured, while sane or insane, within two years from the date of the issuance of such policy, the limit of recovery would be the amount of the premiums paid, it was only liable for the sum of $7, the amount actually paid by Goodbar as premium. The second defense is that the insured, at the time he applied for said insurance, made an application and appended thereto, over his signature, a statement that the representations made therein were true, and were offered to the company as representations upon which they might rely in issuing the said policy; that among the questions asked him in said application was: "Have you ever had any illness, injury or disease other than stated by you above?" That he had not theretofore indicated that he had had any disease or injury, and that the answer to the question was, "No." That in fact and in truth the insured had prior to that time suffered an injury which resulted in the loss of one of his feet, which fact he concealed from the defendant. Third, that he also represented in said written application that he had never applied to a company or agent for insurance without receiving a policy in the exact amount and of the kind applied for, when in fact and in truth within less than one year prior to the issuance of this policy, and the making of this application, he had been rejected and refused insurance by two other companies. Fourth, that the policy provides that it shall continue in force only for the period actually paid for, and that no premium could be paid for a less period than three months, and that the policy was simply delivered to Goodbar for examination, and because of his failure to make the payment of the premium provided by the terms of the policy prior to his death his beneficiary was not entitled to recover thereon. The replication to these defenses denies that the insured committed suicide; asserts that while the premium had not been paid, this requirement had been waived by the company's agent by accepting the due bill or note from the insured for such premium, and unconditionally delivering the policy; and that the representations by the insured that he had received no injury prior to the application for insurance, and had never been refused insurance by any other company, were in effect waived by the defendant because it, through its agent, was fully advised of the facts in regard thereto.

[1] As before indicated, the evidence upon the question of delivery of the policy and waiver of the payment of the premium is conflicting. The agent says that he delivered the policy for examination upon condition that it would be returned if the premium was not paid within thirty days, and that at the time he so delivered it Goodbar signed a writing showing this understanding. This writing, however, is not produced. This agent admits that Mrs. Goodbar was present at the time of delivery. She testifies that when the agent came to deliver the policy he was advised that they did not have the money to pay the premium at that time; that he told them that he would deliver the policy and accept a note or duebill for the balance of the premium, and that this would put the policy in immediate effect; that he did deliver the same, and that he was paid $2 in money and given a note or duebill by the insured, which note or duebill was not paid prior to Goodbar's death. She says that the insurance company's agent also promised on that occasion to indorse a note for them for a larger amount than the balance of the premium, upon which they could secure the money and pay off this duebill, and that she went to his office a day or two afterward to get him to indorse this note, but that he refused to do so. Upon this showing the jury, under the instructions of the court, found that the requirement as to the payment of the premium had been waived by the company. The defendant's counsel do not contend that such a requirement as this could not be waived. That such can be done seems to be well established. 14 R. C. L. title "Insurance," § 362. Nor is it doubted that the testimony of Mrs. Goodbar would constitute a waiver, if true, it being purely a question whether she or the agent correctly reported the facts. The jury's finding is conclusive upon that question.

[2] The next defense relied upon is that of suicide. One of the conditions of the policy is:

"In case of suicide, while sane or insane, within two years from the date on which this insurance begins, the limit of recovery shall be the amount of premiums paid thereon."

Goodbar died within a very few days after the issuance of the policy, and the defendant insists that his death was caused by bichloride of mercury poisoning, self-administered. That his death resulted from bichloride of mercury poisoning there would seem to be no doubt. Dr. Shafer, who attended him at this time, testifies that this was so, and Dr. Steenbergen, who was called in consultation, is likewise positive that Goodbar's death resulted from bichloride of mercury poisoning, and there is no effort to contradict the testimony of these witnesses, or to account for his death upon any other theory. It is stated by these doctors that when they told Goodbar that he had taken bichloride of mercury he denied it, but they attach no significance to this denial, expressing the view that they expected him to make this answer. There is no direct evidence as to how or by whom this poison was administered to the insured. It is within the realm of possibility that it was taken by mistake, or that it was administered to him by some one else innocently, or with a homicidal intent. There is no attempt to show that he procured the poison at any time previous to his death, or how it came into his possession, if in fact it ever did. The tenacity with which men cling to life is so great that suicide will not be presumed unless the state of facts under which death occurs practically excludes every other reasonable hypothesis, and the court so instructed the jury in this case. There is no indication that Goodbar was not in his right mind up until the time of his death. In fact, the evidence shows that he was entirely rational, and was suffering from no sort of delusion or hallucination at any time. While the evidence tending to show death by suicide was very strong, still when we consider that the poison was never traced into Goodbar's possession, and the possibility that it may have been taken innocently by mistake, or been administered to him by some one else under the belief that it was another substance, it may be that the jury's verdict upon this question can be justified. South Atlantic Life Ins. Co. v. Hurt's Adm'r, 115 Va. 398, 79 S. E. 401, and authorities there cited.

[3] In the application for insurance the insured represented that he had never suffered any injury. It appears from the uncontradicted evidence that the insured at the time had only one foot, and the plaintiff, his wife, testified that the missing foot had been off for 12 or 13 years. From this it satisfactorily appears that some 12 or 13 years before the insured had suffered an injury which resulted in the loss of his foot. This representation is a statement of fact within the knowledge of the insured. It is in no sense an expression of opinion upon his part. As we have repeatedly held in cases like this, the company, by asking and demanding answers to certain questions, and the insured, by making answers and asserting their correctness, agree as to their materiality, and make any false statement in regard to a matter within the insured's knowledge ground for vitiating the policy. Of course, if the answer was such as only called for the opinion of the insured, and he gave an honest opinion, he could not be charged with a false representation. There is no opinion called for, however, so far as this question is concerned. It called for a statement from the insured of something that he knew, and his answer is coupled with an assurance upon his part that the defendant could rely upon the truthfulness thereof. The replication attempts to escape the effect of this false representation by asserting that the defendant or its agent, knew the facts when the application was given. It suffices to say that this contention is supported by no evidence whatever. On the contrary, it is shown by the agent that he never saw Goodbar before he came to his office and made application for the insurance, and that he did not know until after the policy was delivered that the insured had only one foot. The medical examiner states that he had no knowledge of Goodbar's condition; that in examining him for the insurance he did not make such an investigation as would disclose this injury, and only discovered it when he subsequently came to attend him while he was sick in bed suffering from the bichloride of mercury poisoning.

[4] The next ground of defense is that the insured represented that he had never applied for and been refused insurance in any other company. This representation is likewise one of fact, and is material, and if false will avoid the policy issued upon an application containing it. 25 Cyc. 819; 14 R. C. L. title "Insurance," § 258; Bacon on Life and Accident Insurance, § 293. The facts proved on this issue are that on the 3d day of December, 1913, Goodbar made an application for a policy of $3,000 in the Ohio National Life Insurance Company. This application was in writing and was signed by Goodbar, and is introduced in evidence in this case with the testimony of the medical director of that company, who likewise testifies that on the 27th of December the application was rejected; that the agent who took the application was at once notified of this fact and directed to return to Goodbar the advance payment of $5 made by him at the time of taking the application, and take up the receipt given him therefor; that this was done, and the receipt given to Goodbar for the $5 returned to the home office of the company at Cincinnati on the 31st of December, 1913. The plaintiff, however, attempts to escape the effect of this refusal by asserting that the application in this case was made on the 1st day of December, 1913, two days before the application made to the Ohio National Life Insurance Company, and she introduced in evidence a receipt which was given by the agent at the time the application was taken, and which is dated December 1, without indicating any year, and she asserts that this was given to her husband by the agent on the 1st day of December, 1913. The application, it is admitted, was taken at the same time. It is dated January 1, 1914, and signed by Goodbar. The medical examination it is shown was made upon the same day, and it is dated January 1, 1914. The agent who took the application, and the physician who made the medical examination, both testify that these dates are correct. The agent admits that the receipt produced was given by him, but he says that the date December 1 is a mistake, and occurred by his writing the name of the previous month from force of habit. This explanation is entirely plausible. Very often those who are in the habit of frequently writing dates, in changing from one month to another, make mistakes like this. If, however, the plaintiff's contention is correct that the transaction was really had on the 1st of December, 1913, we are entirely at a loss to understand why the application signed by Goodbar is dated on the 1st of January following, and the medical examination likewise bore that date. It is quite possible that in writing the date on the first day of the month by mistake the name of a preceding month might be used, but it is without the realm of possibility that the name of a succeeding month and a new year would be inserted. However, this is not so material in this case, as it appears that on the 12th day of June, 1913, the insured made an application in writing to the Conservative Life Insurance Company for a policy of $1,000 on his life. This application is in writing, and is introduced in evidence with the testimony of the secretary of that company who likewise testifies that the insurance asked for was refused, and this fact communicated to the agent who solicited and secured the application, who in turn testifies that he delivered in person to Goodbar the letter advising him of the refusal of the company to issue the policy long before the application in this case was made. There is no attempt to explain this. This false representation unexplained was sufficient to defeat plaintiff's recovery.

[5, 6] This disposes of the several defenses relied upon, but inasmuch as the case will have to go back for a new trial, it is necessary for us to pass upon the instructions. Instruction No. 1 given for the plaintiff told the jury that inasmuch as the defendant relied upon false representations to defeat recovery it must appear from the evidence that such representations were made by the insured, Harry Goodbar, willfully, and with the intent to deceive the insurer, and that such false representations were relied upon by the company; or that the answers to the questions asked were not only false, but that the thing inquired about was peculiarly within the knowledge of the insured; and that if the defendant had failed to establish its defenses of fraudulent representations, or any of them, then the verdict must be for the plaintiff. It was error to give this instruction because it told the jury in the first place that if the defendant failed to establish any of its defenses the verdict must be for the plaintiff, while exactly the reverse of this is true. If the defendant established any one of its defenses, it was entitled to a verdict. It is also misleading in that it submits to the jury the question of the intent with which Goodbar made the representations, and tells the jury that he must have made them willfully, and that they must find that they were relied on. Now the representations relied upon for defense in this case do not call for opinions, and the court should not have submitted the question of the insured's good faith to the jury. These defenses were based upon misrepresentations of facts, of which the insured was bound to have knowledge, and as we have repeatedly held the parties made these questions and answers material by their contract, and if the insured gave false answers to them the policy is vitiated, even though he may have done so with no intention of deceiving, and under the impression that they were not matters of any importance, or even temporarily have forgotten the facts in regard to the transactions inquired about. If it was the purpose of this instruction to submit to the jury the question of the good faith of the insured where a matter of opinion was inquired about, then there was no evidence in the case which justified it. It was, therefore, misleading, and should not have been given. If it was the intention to submit to the jury the question whether these representations were matters of opinion, or whether the answers made thereto were made in good faith, then it was wrong because the questions did not call for any opinion, and as matter of law the good faith of the insured in making the answers was not material. Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, 25 W. Va. 622, 52 Am. Rep. 227; Logan v. Assurance Society, 57 W. Va. 384, 50 S. E. 529; Myers v. Life Ins. Co., 83 W. Va. 390, 98 S. E. 424; Harris v. Ins. Co., 86 W. Va. 638, 104 S. E. 121.

Instruction No. 2 given on behalf of the plaintiff presented the theory that the defendant might waive the requirement of payment of the premium, and tells the jury that if a duebill or note was accepted and the policy delivered unconditionally, this requirement of payment was thereby waived. This instruction, we think, properly propounds the law upon this question.

Instruction No. 3 is on the question of suicide. It tells the jury that if there is a doubt whether the insured came to his death by suicide or natural causes, and there is no convincing evidence upon the cause of his death, the law presumes that his death was produced by natural causes; that the law requires more than a preponderance of the evidence to establish suicide; that every hypothesis consistent with death from natural causes must be excluded. This instruction is a fair statement of the law as to the character of proof required to establish death by suicide, and while the defendant assigns as error the action of the court in giving it, no reason is given or argument adduced to support the assignment.

On the part of the defendant the court gave a number of instructions correctly presenting its various defenses. These instructions, so far as they apply to the false representations made by the plaintiff in his application, are in direct conflict with the plaintiff's instruction No. 1. We think they very clearly present the correct theory to the jury, and that there was no error in refusing to give other instructions offered by the defendant covering the same ground. An instruction was, however, offered by the defendant calling for the judgment of the court upon defendant's defenses, and asking the court to tell the jury as matter of law that defendant had made good defense to the suit, and that the jury should so find. This instruction was refused. In the view of the case we have above outlined it should have been given.

We will reverse the judgment of the circuit court of Cabell county, set aside the verdict of the jury, and remand the cause for a new trial.

MALLEABLE COAL CO v. POTTER et al.
(No. 4222.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 11, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  242(3)—Demurrer incorporated with answer but not filed or acted upon will be disregarded.

A demurrer incorporated in a paper with an answer, but not in any way filed nor acted upon as a demurrer, is disregarded and treated as a fugitive paper, because not shown to have been brought to the attention of the court, notwithstanding the filing of the paper as an answer to be used as an affidavit, on a motion to dissolve an injunction.

2. Railroads  $\S$  216—Cannot be compelled to operate temporarily constructed side track on land under privilege terminable at landowner's will.

A common carrier railroad cannot be required by any judicial process, to reconstruct and operate a side track or other facility temporarily constructed and operated on land adjoining its right of way, under a verbal and gratuitous permission of the owner of the land and an agreement between him and the owner of the railroad, that the privilege so granted should be terminable at the will and option of the owner of the land.

3. Railroads  $\S$  216—Side tracks constructed under lease held removable by landowner.

Uncontradicted testimony of such owner and the operators of such railroad, to the effect that such track or facility was not constructed and operated within the limits of a lease executed by the former to the latter, which is very general and indefinite as to the land covered by it, aided by conduct amounting to a practical construction of the lease, excluding the location in question from it, warrants the dissolution of an injunction inhibiting the landowner from tearing up such track and commanding the railway company to resume the use of it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lincoln County.

Suit by the Malleable Coal Company against James Potter and others, and from a decree dissolving an injunction inhibiting the defendant Roman Pickens from interfering with the operation of a railway, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Price, Smith, Spilman & Clay, of Charleston, and D. E. Wilkinson, of Hamlin, for appellant.

Murray Briggs, of Charleston, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. Appellant, the Malleable Coal Company, complains of an order of the circuit court of Lincoln county, entered in vacation, dissolving an injunction inhibiting the appellee Roman Pickens from interfering with the operation of what is called the tipple track of the Cobbs Creek Railway, and especially from tearing up that track, and commanding the appellees James Potter and Charles Morgan, alleged owners and operators of said railway, without discrimination against said Malleable Coal Company, to haul its coal over said tipple track, for dumping into railway cars on a side track of the Coal River Branch of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway.

The theory of the bill and of the injunction order awarded thereon is that the Cobbs Creek Railway is a common carrier, and, as such, wrongfully ceased and refused, on or about September 18, 1920, further to haul coal of the plaintiff from its mine situated somewhere on the main line of the railway, in the Cobbs Creek Valley, over said tipple track, at the instance and by reason of the protest of the defendant Roman Pickens, on whose land said tipple track is located; and, that, soon after September 27, 1920, the Public Service Commission of this state having ordered said railway company to resume the hauling of the plaintiff's coal, Pickens and his employees wrongfully tore up portions of that track and thus prevented obedience to the order.

The temporary injunction inhibited Pickens from further molestation of the track and required the railway company to restore the portion of it that had been torn up and resume and continue the hauling of the coal.

[1] If the facts disclosed by the pleadings and the depositions taken and filed justified dissolution of the injunction, it will be unnecessary to enter upon any inquiry as to the propriety of the remedy invoked by the plaintiff. Sufficiency of the bill was not tested by any demurrer thereto. In a paper filed by him, the defendant Pickens demurred to the bill and answered it, but that paper was not filed as a demurrer. On the hearing of the motion, it was filed as an answer, together with the answer of Charles Morgan filed in the same way, and treated as an affidavit. A demurrer incorporated in the body of an answer, but not mentioned or referred to in the caption thereof, nor in any decree or order in the cause, is disregarded and treated as a fugitive paper, because it does not appear to have been brought to the attention of the court. Pheasant v. Hanna, 63 W. Va. 613, 60 S. E. 618. It is not perceived that mention of the demurrer in the caption can make any difference. The paper was never filed as a demurrer and the caption is not material. Nothing in the order suggests consideration of the bill as to its sufficiency.

The Cobbs Creek Railway is a narrow-gauge road built primarily for the hauling of logs and lumber, about the year 1906, by the Mohler Lumber Company, in conjunction with one W. W. Smoot; the former furnishing the materials and the latter doing the construction work, with the understanding that he should have 45 per cent. of the profits arising from the operation of the road, and the lumber company 55 per cent. Near the mouth of Cobbs creek, it connected with what was then the Coal River Railroad, now the Coal River Branch of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway. At that point, it was necessary to pass over the land of Pickens, for some distance, and the Mohler Lumber Company procured a lease of about two acres of the Pickens land, within which the main line and a side track called the loading track and some other terminal facilities were located. The track now in controversy, the tipple track, was not built at that time, nor until the year 1917. Nor is the Mohler Lumber Company lease very important now, since it expired in the year 1913. Lumber and timber transportation over the road, by the Mohler Lumber Company, seems to have terminated about the year 1909, and, early in that year, the operators of the road began to transport oil well supplies over it up into the Cobbs Creek region of country. Thereupon a controversy is said to have arisen between Pickens and the lumber company, as to right in the latter to transport anything other than timber and timbering supplies over the land. Smoot says he became the sole owner of it in July, 1918, and operated it until September 1, 1919, on which date it passed into the hands of James Potter & Co., under a contract of purchase, made about July 1, 1919. Smoot may have owned the road individually at an earlier date.

[2, 3] He operated it under the arrangement between himself and the Mohler Lumber Company, or as his own, and constructed what is known as the tipple track in 1917, when he was paying Pickens rent at the rate of $75 per month. It seems to be about 500 feet long and turns off from the main line near the point at which that line emerges from the Cobbs Creek Valley, and crossing level land between that line and the hill, runs up along the hillside to a point at which the tipple used by the Malleable Coal Company stands apparently on the right of way of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, in part, and on the land of Pickens, in part. The ownership of the tipple seems to be conceded to the Malleable Coal Company, but by whom it was erected is not clearly disclosed. This track was never used for any purpose other than the transportation of the Malleable Coal Company's coal from its mine somewhere up Cobbs creek to this tipple. Both Smoot and Pickens testify that it was constructed under a verbal permit given by the latter and without charge for the use and occupation of the land. Smoot says he hauled coal for the Malleable Coal Company until December, 1918, at which time that company closed its mine, but that Pickens had interrupted his use of it on two occasions, before he ceased to use it by reason of the closing of the mine. Pickens says he gave Smoot permission to use the land for that track until he should need it himself. Under the impression that he would have no further use for the track, Smoot took up the rails from it in March, 1919. Between that date and July 1, 1919, he entered into negotiations with James Potter & Co., for sale of the railway to them for use in connection with their oil and gas operations in the Cobbs Creek country in which they had a lease of 12,900 acres of oil territory. The sale seems to have been made as of July 1, 1919, but late in June of that year a flood damaged the railway, and Smoot had to repair it before the purchasers would consummate their contract. In doing so, he used the rails taken from the tipple track.

On July 1, 1919, the date of the purchase of the railway, and after the rails had been taken from the tipple track and while the mine of the Malleable Coal Company was closed, James Potter & Co. leased from Pickens, for a period of five years, at a rental of $100 per month, what is described as about a quarter of an acre of land, as being the same tract of land which was occupied by the terminal of the Cobbs Creek Railway, as having one office building, one holsting house, one small freighthouse, and one sandhouse on it, and as being then under lease by the month to the Cobbs Creek Railway Company. Under this lease the lessee has the privilege of renewal for an additional five years and also the privilege of termination, upon three months' notice and the payment of all rentals, at any time within the term. Having coal in the land of the leased premises, Pickens made this reservation: "Right to load coal on and over the eastern part of the property hereby leased where the coal dumps are now located"—if he should desire to do so. The only dumps disclosed by the evidence, as being located on the eastern part of the leased property, are the loading tipple of the Malleable Coal Company and what is called the Jarrett and Wright coal chute. At a date not disclosed, Pickens had leased his coal to Jarrett and Wright and they had opened a mine in the hillside, near the right of way of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, and constructed a chute leading to a side track. Finding the dip of the coal to be in the direction of their mining, they discontinued their operation. At a date not given, Pickens leased his land to Smoot and Carter for mining, and they opened a mine and erected a tipple near the main line of the Cobbs Creek Railway, with intent to load the coal into the narrow-gauge cars of that road, for transportation over the main line and the tipple track and transfer thereof, by means of the Malleable Coal Company's tipple, into the standard-gauge cars of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company.

In August, 1919, under a verbal permission given by Pickens, to James Potter & Co., operators of the Cobbs Creek Railway, the Malleable Coal Company replaced the rails on the tipple track, and began the shipment of coal over it to their tipple. At about the same time, Smoot and Carter endeavored to obtain permission of the Malleable Coal Company to load their coal into Chesapeake & Ohio cars from the same tipple. Their request having been refused, they endeavored to obtain permission for the placing of box cars on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company side track, apparently owned or controlled by the Malleable Coal Company. This privilege having been denied, Pickens notified James Potter & Co. not to haul any more coal over the tipple track for the Malleable Coal Company, and, in obedience to this order, they ceased to do so. Thereupon the Malleable Coal Company applied to the Public Service Commission of this state for an order requiring the railway to transport its coal. A temporary order was awarded, and then Pickens took up some of the rails from the track and thus prevented resumption of transportation. In this state of affairs, the Malleable Coal Company applied for and obtained said injunction.

It is manifestly unnecessary to determine whether or not the Cobbs Creek Railway is a common carrier. If it is, it does not follow that the tipple track is permanently or irrevocably located upon the land of Pickens. Whether the track in question belongs to that company or not is left in doubt by the evidence. It desired to haul the coal, and the producer of the coal wanted it hauled. It obtained permission for restoration of the track, and the coal producing company restored it under that permission. It was originally built by the railway company as a tenant at will of Pickens and restored and the use thereof resumed in the same manner, except as to the reconstruction. The contention that Pickens leased the tipple to James Potter & Co. is not well founded. The argument is that he must have leased it, because he reserved the right to use it, and that the lease of the tipple impliedly included a lease of the means of using it, namely, the tipple track. The terms of the reservation in the lease do not warrant this conclusion. Pickens reserved the right to load coal on and over the eastern part of the property at the point where the coal dumps were located. There are no words in the reservation fairly indicative of intention to reserve right to use the Malleable Coal Company's tipple. The reserved right was to load coal over the eastern part of the property. The mention of the dumps was mere matter of description of the portion of the land the lessor reserved the right to use.

The indefinite lease giving no boundary lines, interpreted by the evidence bearing upon its meaning, found in the record, does not include the land on which the tipple is located. If the terms, "Now under lease by the month to the said Cobbs Creek Railway Co.," could be treated as a reference to the lease given the Mohler Lumber Company, the land on which part of the tipple track is located is not within that lease, and that track was no part of the Cobbs Creek Railway terminal while the lease was in force, nor between the year 1913, in which it expired, and the year 1917. If the lease was continued as a verbal holding over from year to year, on payment of rental, it still cannot be regarded as embracing all of the land on which the tipple track is located. If the payments of rental from 1913 until 1917 were made merely for terminal facilities and did not continue the lease, the terminal facilities did not then include the tipple track. They included only the main track, the loading track, sandhouse, freight house, office, and hoist. In the new lease taken July 1, 1919, the area of the leased land is described as being about a quarter of an acre. In the Mohler Lumber Company lease of 1906, the area is described as embracing about two acres. Hence, it is clear that there was no intention to lease, on July 1, 1919, all of the land that was in the former lease. Moreover, in 1919, the tipple track was not one of the terminal facilities of the railway. It was not then in operation. The rails had been taken from it and used for repair of the main line. Besides, it was not used for general railway purposes, but only for the hauling of the Malleable Coal Company's coal to its tipple. According to the evidence of Smoot and Pickens, it was not constructed under the monthly lease referred to in the later lease. It was a mere privilege outside of the lease, gratuitously and temporarily conferred. No witness expressly contradicts this testimony, nor do any established facts or circumstances overthrow it. The grant and acceptance of this privilege amounted to a practical construction of the monthly lease by the parties thereto. Likewise, the conduct and circumstances attending the restoration of the track practically construed both the monthly lease and the new lease of July 1, 1919.

Upon this view of the evidence, including the situation, purposes, and relations of the parties, we are of the opinion that the court below did not err in its dissolution of the injunction. The order under review is an interlocutory one, entered upon proof that is very incomplete as to some of the vital issues involved. It does not appreciably tend to sustain the contention of the appellant. Additional evidence to be taken for the final hearing and disposition of the cause may be sufficient to establish right to the relief sought, if the remedy adopted is appropriate.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be affirmed.

RAINES v. STOKELY et al. (No. 2307.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Specific performance  $\S$ 114(2)—Description of land in petition held sufficient.

The description in the petition of the lot of land for the conveyance of which specific performance was sought was sufficiently definite to identify the subject-matter of the contract of sale.

2. Specific performance  $\S$ 123—Whether evidence showed parol contract for sale of land beyond a reasonable doubt was for the jury.

Under the evidence in the case it was a question for the jury to decide whether the parol contract for the sale of the land was made out so clearly, strongly, and satisfactorily as to leave no reasonable doubt as to the agreement.

3. Specific performance  $\S$ 121(11)—Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that tender of balance of purchase money on lot in controversy was made.

There was a general statement in the plaintiff's testimony to the effect that she "offered her [the defendant of whom specific performance is sought] what the balance was on the lot that I was claiming; * * * she didn't take the money, but I am still willing to pay it to her;" and, besides, a letter was introduced in evidence from the plaintiff to the defendant, stating that she makes tender of the money; and this testimony in regard to tender was uncontroverted. Such evidence would have authorized the jury to find that a tender of the balance due of the purchase money for the lot in controversy was duly made.

4. Parties  $\S$ 84(4)—Whether purchaser could proceed against vendor's sole heir for specific performance without making administrator a party should have been raised by demurrer, and not motion for nonsuit.

If the defendant in the case had desired to challenge the right of the plaintiff to proceed against the widow of the vendor of the land, who is alleged to be the sole heir of her deceased husband, and to have specific performance of the husband's contract, without making the administrator of the latter a party, this question should have been raised by demurrer, and not by a motion for nonsuit.

5. Pleading ¶212—Where a question was properly raised by demurrer and presumably abandoned, it cannot avail defendant in motion for nonsuit.

While there was a general demurrer to the petition, and also a special demurrer upon the ground that no definite or special time was alleged within which the plaintiff was to make payment of the unpaid balances of the purchase money, no ruling upon this demurrer seems to have been invoked, and the question thus properly raised by demurrer and presumably abandoned could not avail the defendant in his motion for a nonsuit.

6. Evidence in specific performance action hold sufficient for submission.

Under all the evidence in the case, the same should have been submitted to the jury under proper instruction from the court.

HENDERSON v. COOK. (No. 12294.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Oct. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Although a witness may have been successfully impeached, in that the jury believe that he has previously made statements contradictory to his sworn testimony as to matters relevant to the case, it is not required of them that they should disregard such of his sworn testimony as is in conflict with his previous statements, since the jury are still entitled to determine the credit to be given any portion of his testimony when thus impeached, including the part thus contradicted; and this is true although, in order to accept his sworn testimony, they must reject as untrue the previous contradictory statements which they believe to have been made. Waycaster v. State, 136 Ga. 95 (3), 102, 70 S. E. 883. It was therefore error for the judge to charge as follows: "In this case the court instructs you that a witness may be impeached by proof of contradictory statements previously made by him as to matters relevant to his testimony and to this case. If an attempt has been made by proof of contradictory statements previously made by any witness in this case to impeach that witness, you may determine, from all the testimony, first, whether any such statements have been made, and, secondly, whether such statements were contradictory statements to those which have been made by the witness on the stand, and, thirdly, whether they are material to his testimony and the case; and if any witness has been successfully impeached by proof of contradictory statements, you would disregard any statement in conflict with statements previously made, unless corroborated by other testimony, direct or circumstantial; and the credit to be given the balance of the testimony would be for the jury to determine." See Purvis v. Atlanta Northern Ry. Co., 136 Ga. 852, 72 S. E. 343; Ga. Ry. & Electric Co. v. Cocke, 137 Ga. 720, 74 S. E. 244, in which the charges held to be erroneous were very similar to that excepted to in the instant case.

2. Trial ¶296(1)—Specific erroneous instruction not cured by general.

Where the court gives to the jury an instruction which is plain, specific, and erroneous within itself, such as might tend to prejudice the rights of a litigant upon one of the material questions in the case, the fact that subsequently, and in connection with his charge upon another and kindred phase of the law, he may use language so general that it might possibly be construed as correctly covering the principle of law originally but erroneously charged upon cannot properly be taken as correcting or curing the original error. Thus, the harmful effect of the charge referred to in the first division of the syllabus was neither corrected nor cured by this instruction immediately following: "If a witness swears willfully and knowingly false, his testimony should be disregarded by the jury, unless corroborated by other witnesses' testimony. It is a question for the jury to determine whether a witness has been impeached, and the credibility of such witness, and the weight his testimony shall receive in the consideration of the case." Even if such general instruction as is contained in the last sentence just quoted could properly be taken as sufficient to cure the plain and specific error complained of, when directly applied to and given in immediate connection with the erroneous charge (see ruling and dissent in Scog- gins v. State, 23 Ga. App. 366, 98 S. E. 240), such could not be the rule where, as here, the language which is relied upon as a correction does not follow the erroneous charge, but could reasonably and naturally be taken as having reference to the intervening instruction relative to another phase of the law of impeachment. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Deas, 22 Ga. App. 425 (3), 96 S. E. 267. No question as to the correctness of the rules stated in the subsequent clause of the charge, which is thus relied upon purely as a correction of the previous error, is presented for determination.

3. Trial  $\Leftrightarrow$  296(4, 5)—Jury held not misled by language used in charge in view of rest of charge.

In charging the law upon the degree of care required of the plaintiff, a child under the age of 14 years, the court fully and clearly drew the distinction between the diligence required by such a plaintiff and the general rule applicable to adults; and later, in connection with the language excepted to, referred to the distinction which he had already pointed out, and instructed the jury to apply the rule previously given to the instructions then given. The jury could not therefore have been reasonably misled by the language complained of. The remaining exceptions to the charge fail to show any prejudicial error.

4. Exception without merit.

The exception taken to the admission of testimony is without merit, treating the statement complained of as having been made by the plaintiff himself. If, according to the peculiar, ambiguous language used, such statement be taken as having been made by a mere bystander, it would be inadmissible. But as the ambiguity is not likely to recur in a succeeding trial, it is not necessary to elaborate that phase of the exception.

FINCHER v. DAVIS. (No. 12108.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Oct. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Physicians and surgeons  $\Leftrightarrow$  14(1), 18(7,9)—Physicians liable for want of care; degree of care exercised question for jury; attendant facts and circumstances considered.

"A person professing to practice surgery or the administering of medicine for a compensation must bring to the exercise of his profession a reasonable degree of care and skill. Any injury resulting from a want of such care and skill will be a tort for which a recovery may be had." Civil Code 1910, § 4427. "The exercise of this degree of care and skill is the measure of professional duty in all cases; and whether this degree of care and skill has been exercised in a given case is a question of fact for the jury." Edwards v. Roberts, 12 Ga. App. 140, 76 S. E. 1054. In determining such an issue, "the jury may consider all" the attendant facts and circumstances "which may throw light on the ultimate question." Face v. Cochran, 144 Ga. 261, 265, 86 S. E. 934, 936.

2. Physicians and surgeons  $\Leftrightarrow$  18(6), 24(3)—Burden on physician suing for price to show services and reasonable price; presumed that medical services are performed in skillful manner.

In an action by a physician and surgeon to recover the value of professional services rendered, the burden is on him to prove that he is a physician, that he was employed as such, that he rendered the services alleged, and to show the value of such services as represented by the ordinary and reasonable price for services of that nature. 30 Cyc. 1601; 9 Enc. of Evidence, 823, 829. In such an action (as well as in a suit brought by a patient for malpractice) the presumption is that the surgical or medical services were performed in an ordinarily skillful manner, and the burden is on the person receiving the services to show a want of due care, skill, and diligence. Ga. Northern Ry. Co. v. Ingram, 114 Ga. 639, 640, 40 S. E. 703; Akridge v. Noble, 114 Ga. 949, 958, 41 S. E. 78; 30 Cyc. 1602; 21 R. C. L. 406; 9 Enc. of Evidence, 834. The court did not err in so charging.

3. Husband and wife  $\Leftrightarrow$  19(15)—Husband liable for professional services for wife.

Where a physician or surgeon renders necessary professional services for a wife, with her consent, the husband is primarily liable therefor, even in the absence of any express consent on his own part. Civil Code 1910, §§ 2296, 2297; Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co. v. Vaughan, 9 Ga. App. 371, 372(4), 71 S. E. 691. The charge of the court, that if the operation was performed "wholly without any authority from this defendant, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover a fee for such operation," was more favorable to the defendant than the rule required.

4. Evidence  $\Leftrightarrow$  506, 543, 550(1) — Physician could testify that operation in his presence was done skillfully; expert may give opinion, based on testimony of others, or on own observation.

The private physician and surgeon of the wife, who was familiar with the case and all the attendant facts and circumstances, and who witnessed the operation, was asked and answered the following question: "Q. Was this operation done in a skillful manner? A. Yes, sir." The question and answer were objected to upon the ground that they trench upon the province of the jury in seeking and eliciting a conclusion upon the main issue in the case. Held, the opinion of an expert on any question relating to his profession, trade, or business is always admissible, when given in response to a hypothetical question based upon the testimony of witnesses other than himself, or where, as here, the expert has himself observed the facts, and gives his opinion based upon his own observation. Civil Code (1910), §§ 5876, 5874; Yates v. State, 127 Ga. 813(4), 817, 56 S. E. 1017; Taylor v. State, 135 Ga. 622(6), 70 S. E. 237; Crankshaw v. Schweizer Mfg. Co., 1 Ga. App. 363, 58 S. E. 222.

5. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$ 1064(1)—Physicians and surgeons  $\Leftrightarrow$ 14(1)—Trial  $\Leftrightarrow$ 253(9)—Instruction as to expert testimony in action for malpractice held harmless, and not subject to objection that it ignored other evidence.

The court charged the jury: "In considering whether the plaintiff in his diagnosis, care, and treatment of defendant's wife exercised ordinary care and skill, the jury may not set up a standard of their own, but must be guided in that regard solely by the testimony of physicians; and if you are unable to determine from the testimony of physicians and surgeons what constitutes ordinary care and skill under the circumstances of this case, then there is a failure of proof upon the only standard for your guidance, and the evidence is insufficient to sustain the defendant's plea, and you should find for the plaintiff a reasonable amount for the services rendered." Error is assigned as to this instruction because "It limited the jury to a consideration of the testimony of physicians and surgeons only in determining whether or not plaintiff was guilty of negligence, when the law requires that all of the testimony introduced in the trial of a case be considered by the jury in determining whether or not a party has exercised the degree of care, skill, and diligence required by law." Held, the standard of duty and diligence to which physicians and surgeons are amenable is prescribed solely by section 4427 of the Civil Code of 1910, and requires that in the practice of their profession they exercise "a reasonable degree of care and skill," but this, the invariable standard when applied to the facts and circumstances of any particular case, must be taken and considered to be such a degree of care and skill as, under similar conditions and like surrounding circumstances, is ordinarily employed by the profession generally. The trial judge was manifestly seeking to impress upon the jury that they were unauthorized to impose any other capricious standard; and while the language may not have been strictly accurate, in that the recognized methods employed by physicians and surgeons in the performance of such an operation might conceivably be shown by persons other than members of the medical profession, yet, since in point of fact the only testimony introduced along that line was that of physicians and surgeons, the inaccuracy of expression must necessarily have been harmless. The charge complained of, while it may have sought to limit the methods of proving the specific duties owing by the plaintiff, by confining such proof to testimony of physicians and surgeons, did not, as urged, thus limit the proof of negligence.

6. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$ 1001(1)—Findings of jury on abundant evidence not interfered with.

The only negligence charged by the plea and answer being that of infection in the operation in question, and the jury, under the evidence, being abundantly authorized, if, indeed, not absolutely compelled, to find adversely to such plea, this court will not interfere.

1. Negligence  $\Leftrightarrow$ 62(1), 111(3), 136(25)—Petition must show defendant's act caused injury; question of proximate cause for jury; injury need not result from defendant's acts alone.

While the determination of questions of negligence lies peculiarly within the province of the jury, and in the exercise of this function the question as to what constitutes the proximate cause of the injury complained of may be directly involved as one of the essential elements and disputed issues in the ascertainment of what negligence, as well as whose negligence the injury is properly attributable to; and while it is also true that the mere fact that the injury would not and could not have resulted by reason of the defendant's acts alone will not of itself be taken to limit and define the intervening agency as constituting the proximate cause (Rollestone v. Cassirer & Co., 3 Ga. App. 161, 173, 59 S. E. 442; Ga. Ry. & Power Co. v. Ryan, 24 Ga. App. 288, 100 S. E. 713), yet a demurrer to a petition should be sustained where it appears from the plaintiff's pleading that the negligence charged against the defendant was not the proximate and effective cause of the injury. Southern Ry. Co. v. Barber, 12 Ga. App. 286, 77 S. E. 172. The most generally accepted theory of causation is that of natural and probable consequences (Mayor and Council of Macon v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 847, 848, 31 S. E. 443); and, in order to hold the defendant liable, the petition must show either that the act complained of was the sole occasion of the injury, or that it put in operation other causal forces, such as were the direct, natural, and probable consequences of the original act, or that the intervening agency could have reasonably been anticipated or foreseen by the original wrongdoer. Southern Ry. Co. v. Webb, 116 Ga. 152, 42 S. E. 395, 59 L. R. A. 109; Hardwick v. Figgers, 26 Ga. App. 494, 106 S. E. 738.

The mere fact that the defendant might have allowed his line of telephone wire to touch the limb of a tree cannot be taken to have as a natural and probable consequence that some other person would fell a tree across the properly strung line of electric wires stretched six feet above the telephone wire, so as to bring the two lines in contact, and by such a concurrence of events complete a short circuit, or that such intervening agency could have been reasonably foreseen or anticipated by the defendant.

ANDERSON v. ANDERSON. (No. 12505.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 24, 1921.)

1. Partition ⚡51—Statutory notice sufficient to bring parties into court.

In applications for partition of "lands and tenements in this state the party applying for the writ of partition shall give to the other parties concerned at least 20 days' notice of his intention to make application." No other process is necessary than this statutory notice in order to bring the respondent into court to meet the application. Civ. Code 1910, § 5360; Cock v. Callaway, 141 Ga. 731, 82 S. E. 286.

2. Partition ⚡55(1)—Application to be made by petition setting forth facts and circumstances.

In statutory procedure for partition of lands and tenements in this state, in so far as the application is concerned, it is only necessary that the "application shall be by petition, setting forth plainly and distinctly the facts and circumstances of the case, describing the premises to be partitioned, and defining the share and interest of each of the parties therein." Civ. Code 1910, § 5358. The petition in the instant case complies fully with these essentials, and the demurrers thereto were properly overruled.

"Whenever application is made for partition of lands and tenements, * * * and either of the parties in interest shall make it satisfactorily appear to the court that a fair and equitable division of the lands and tenements cannot be made by means of metes and bounds, * * * or that the value of the entire lands and tenements will be depreciated by the partition, * * * the court shall order a sale of such" premises. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5365, 5366. A petition, otherwise complying with the statutory requirements, which alleges that on account of improvements a fair and equitable division could not be made by means of metes and bounds, and that to do so would cause the value of the entire lands and tenements to depreciate, and therefore praying for a sale and division of the proceeds, constitutes in substance and effect a petition for the partition of lands and tenements. A partition of the proceeds of the sale of the lands and tenements is in all essential particulars a partition of the lands and tenements, and it is immaterial whether the applicant prays for a partition by sale or a partition by metes and bounds. In an application in either form and with either prayer the issues are the same.

4. Partition ⚡77(1)—Evidence ⚡568(4)—Jury or trial judge can form own opinion as to value of land.

Testimony as to value of property is opinion evidence, and is entitled to weight in proportion to the intelligence, experience, information, and character of the witness. Its probative value is entirely for the judgment and decision of the trier (whether judge or jury), who may form his own conclusion and rely upon his opinion, irrespective of the evidence of the witnesses, provided that in the facts submitted there is enough to enable the trier to form an opinion. On the question as to the value of lands and tenements, arising on the hearing of an application for partition either by a sale or by means of metes and bounds, when the physical topography and construction of the lands and tenements are in evidence, along with opinions of the value of the premises as a whole or in division, the trial judge can form his own opinion, and order a sale or division by means of metes and bounds, as in his opinion will be to the best pecuniary interests of those concerned. Civ. Code 1910, § 5875; Baker v. Richmond City Mill Works, 105 Ga. 225, 31 S. E. 426; Mitchell v. State, 6 Ga. App. 558, 85 S. E. 326; Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 425.

5. Appeal and error ⚡1054(3)—Admission of written guaranty tendered by party in partition suit to give certain sum for land, if sold, not prejudicial error.

On the hearing by the court of an application for partition of lands and tenements, either by sale or by metes and bounds, where only two parties owned the property, and one tendered, for the purpose of being made a part of the record, a written guaranty, secured by collateral, that, in case of a sale of the property as a whole, he would give a certain sum for it, and over the objection of counsel that it was not evidence and without probative value the judge considered the instrument and made it a part of his judgment, and a lien on the interest of the guarantor was created thereby to secure its payment, this, in view of the wide discretion which the statute lodges in the trial courts in the partition of lands and tenements, was not harmful error, if error at all. It might have been regarded as opinion evidence of the offeror or guarantor as to the value of the property when sold as a whole. Whether this be true or not, the acceptance and consideration of the instrument was immaterial, as the judgment of the court is expressly based on the "evidence" that it was for the pecuniary interest of both parties that the property be sold.

6. Partition  $\S$ 77(3)—In kind to be had, if possible, without pecuniary damage.

Joint owners of land are entitled to have partition in kind, each to have his share allotted to him in severalty, unless this right be waived. Whether in equity or under the statutes, the court has no right to decree or order a sale of lands and tenements without consent, unless it finds two concurring conditions: (1) That partition in kind cannot be conveniently made; and (2) that the interest of the parties owning the land will be promoted by a sale. Partition in kind is the rule, and should be followed if it can be done without pecuniary damage. Sentimental considerations should have great weight, especially in the preservation of the home, but pecuniary interests should be the determining factor. Tucker v. Parks, 70 Ga. 414; Croston v. Male, 56 W. Va. 205, 49 S. E. 136, 107 Am. St. Rep. 918; Clason v. Clason, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 541.

7. Appeal and error  $\S$ 1009(2)—Finding that land should be sold in partition proceeding not interfered with, if supported by evidence.

An adjudication by a trial court, after hearing the evidence, that the conditions require a sale on a petition for partition, and that the lands and tenements in question cannot be partitioned by means of metes and bounds without depreciation in value, is entitled to great weight. Unless such a decision is wholly without evidence to support it, or the result of an erroneous view of the law, this court is powerless to interfere. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5368, 6502, 6108; High Co. v. Adams Co., 5 Ga. App. 863, 63 S. E. 1125; Hixon v. Callaway, 5 Ga. App. 416(2), 63 S. E. 518.

1. Negligence  $\S$ 98 — Rule of comparative negligence under Employers' Liability Act stated.

Under the Employer's Liability Act of this state (Civ. Code 1910, § 2782 et seq.), a railway employee is not required to be wholly blameless in order to recover damages for injuries received, but the rule of comparative negligence obtains, and the plaintiff may be able to recover partial damages on account of the negligence of the railway company, notwithstanding his own fault, which might in some less degree have contributed to the injury, provided the fault of the plaintiff did not amount to a lack of ordinary care, and provided also that he did not fail to exercise ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to avoid the consequences of the defendant's negligence after it had or should have become known. Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co. v. Tompkins, 9 Ga. App. 154, 70 S. E. 965.

2. Master and servant  $\S$ 289(31)—Negligence  $\S$ 136(26) — Contributory negligence question for jury.

Since questions of negligence, including contributory negligence, lie peculiarly within the province of the jury, they cannot, except in plain and indisputable cases, be determined otherwise. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Spencer, 24 Ga. App. 471, 101 S. E. 198. The mere fact that a person should attempt to mount or leave a moving train or locomotive will not be accounted negligence as a matter of law; but whether or not such an act constitutes negligence, and, if so, the degree of negligence, depends upon the particular facts and circumstances of danger and of justification attending the transaction. Suber v. Ga. Carolina & Northern Ry. Co., 96 Ga. 42, 23 S. E. 387; Travelers' Protective Ass'n v. Small, 115 Ga. 455, 41 S. E. 628; Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Weathers, 27 Ga. App. —, 106 S. E. 556.

3. Negligence  $\S$ 101 — Rule of comparative negligence under Employer's Liability Act applied.

Under the evidence disclosed by the record in this case, it was for the jury to say whether the engineer of the defendant company suddenly and without warning applied a great increase of steam to the locomotive, so as suddenly and without warning to increase its speed while the plaintiff was attempting to remount it after having changed the switch. If this be not so found, the plaintiff's case must fail; but if so found, they should then determine whether or not the engineer knew or ought to have known that the plaintiff was then and there attempting to remount the moving locomotive, and, if so, whether or not the engineer was negligent in thus applying the steam under such circumstances. If, under the evidence, the jury should find that the defendant was not thus negligent, the plaintiff's case would fail for that reason. If, however, the finding of the jury should be against the defendant on these questions, the plaintiff would then be entitled to recover in some amount, unless the evidence should show one of four things: (1) That the defendant's negligence did not contribute to the injury; or (2) that the plaintiff, under the circumstances, was himself guilty of a lack of ordinary care contributing to the injury, in seeking to remount the moving locomotive; or (3) that in so doing, he was guilty of a degree of contributory negligence equal to or greater than that of the defendant; or (4) that he could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence after it had or should have become known. In any of these events the plaintiff could not recover. If, however, the jury should find against the defendant on the issue of its negligence, and in favor of the plaintiff upon the last-mentioned questions, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover either full or partial damages, according to whether the jury might find the plaintiff entirely blameless, or negligent in some less degree than the defendant.

FLEETWOOD v. SWIFT & CO. (No. 12246.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Oct. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Food  $\S$  25—Duties of retailer as to sale of wholesome products contained in unbroken packages.

A retailer or one acting as the mere distributor to the retail trade of a food product contained in unbroken packages as put up by and procured from a reputable dealer, distributor, or manufacturer is not prima facie liable in damages to a consumer for injuries occasioned by a deleterious condition of the product, since he could not in the exercise of ordinary diligence be expected to open for inspection the individual packages thus prepared by another; but in an action against either the retailer or the distributor, upon proof of such an injury and that the product was handled by the defendant, he is required to show his own diligence to the extent that he had in good faith purchased the merchandise from a reputable dealer, distributor, or manufacturer, as an article reasonably sound and safe for the use intended. Especially would this be true where the package containing the product fails to disclose the identity of the manufacturer or packer responsible for the quality and condition of the product. Atlanta Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. Danneman, 25 Ga. App. 43, 102 S. E. 542 (3); Payne v. Rome Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 10 Ga. App. 762, 73 S. E. 1087.

2. Food  $\S$  25—Plaintiff confined to issue raised by pleadings.

The plaintiff having brought a common-law action for damages on account of the alleged negligence of the defendant in packing and distributing the food product, and not having set up or invoked the criminal provisions of the state "pure food law," nor alleged any acts constituting a violation thereof, the case must be tried and determined upon the basis of the issues raised by the evidence under the pleadings, and the plaintiff cannot be permitted in his exceptions to go outside of the issues to which he is thus confined. Flesher v. Carstens Packing Co., 81 Wash. 241, 142 Pac. 694; Hoffman v. Watkins, 78 Wash. 118, 138 Pac. 664; Acres v. Frederick & Nelson, 79 Wash. 402, 140 Pac. 870.

(Additional Syllabus by the Editorial Staff.)

3. Food  $\S$  25—One professing to act as distributor in guaranteeing weight not liable for injuries from defects in quality.

Printing on a package of butter, whereby defendant professed to act as distributor of such brand of butter and guaranteed the correctness of the weight when packed, cannot be construed as an adoption by the defendant of the product as its own so as to render it liable for a deleterious condition of the butter, if acquired in good faith from a reputable manufacturer.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by O. L. Fleetwood against Swift & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This action was for damages on account of certain injuries to the plaintiff and certain expenses connected with the illness and burial of his infant child, all alleged to have been occasioned by the part consumption of a package of butter containing a decomposed mouse head, which the plaintiff had bought of a local firm of retail grocers, branded as "Brookfield Creamery Butter," and which had been packed and distributed to the grocer for retail sale by the defendant, Swift & Co. By paragraph 2 of the petition it is alleged that:

"Said defendant is engaged in the business of manufacturing, packing, and selling to the retail dealers, for sale by them to the general public, meats and other products, including butter, to be used as food, and did prior to the 4th day of July, 1919, pack and distribute certain butter or compound branded by said defendant as 'Brookfield Creamery Butter,' in cartons containing one pound net weight."

The defendant, in answer to this paragraph, pleaded as follows:

"In answer to paragraph 2 of plaintiff's petition, this defendant admits the following portion of said petition, to wit: 'Said defendant is engaged in the business of manufacturing, packing, and selling to the retail dealers, for sale by them to the general public, meats and other products, including butter, to be used as food,' but this defendant denies the remainder of said paragraph."

It denied all allegations of the petition setting up damage to the plaintiff and liability on its part, and denied that "any of said items sued for are traceable to, or in any wise due to, negligence on the part of this defendant." On the trial the evidence of the grocerymen showed that the package of butter sold by them to the plaintiff on July 4, 1919, had been purchased from the defendant, Swift & Co., on June 27, 1919, as a portion of a 60-pound order; that the butter was packed in one-pound cartons after each cake had been wrapped in tissue paper; that these pound packages were shipped together in one large carton or box; and that, when received by them, the merchandise appeared to be in the same condition as when manufactured and placed in the cartons. The carton which contained the butter sold to the plaintiff was introduced in evidence and upon it was printed:

"Brookfield Creamery Butter. One pound net weight. The within contents weighed one pound when packed. Owing to the natural shrinkage due to evaporation and other causes, the contents are not guaranteed to weigh, at the time of sale, the amount marked on the package, but the sale is made at the packed weight. [Signed] Swift & Co., U. S., Distributors."

The evidence for the plaintiff was such as could be taken to establish an injury to the plaintiff, occasioned by the existence of the alleged deleterious substance. Upon the conclusion of the testimony offered in his behalf, a nonsuit was granted.

Dowling & Askew, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

Hill & Gibson, of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] It is the contention of the defendant that the nonsuit was proper, on the theory that, since the defendant in its answer has denied that it manufactured or packed the shipment, and since, as he contends, the plaintiff's evidence shows that the defendant was but the mere distributor of the merchandise, the defendant could not be held liable for any negligence, since it could not be the duty of a mere distributor to open up, cut into, and inspect the sealed packages; and it is urged that, without doing so, there could manifestly be nothing to indicate the deleterious nature of the contents of the sealed packages. We agree in large part with the position taken by counsel for defendant. In Ruling Case Law, vol. 11, p. 1124, § 29, the rule is stated as follows:

"The early rules of law were formulated upon the theory that the provision dealer and the victualer, having an opportunity to observe and inspect the appearance and quality of the food products offered to the public, were accordingly charged with knowledge of their imperfections. But no knowledge of the original or present contents of a perfect appearing can or sealed package is possible in the practical use of such products. They cannot be chemically analyzed every time they are used. Accordingly, the reason for the rule having ceased, a new rule should be applied to the sale and use of packed goods that will more nearly harmonize with what is rational and just. While there is authority to the contrary, it comports better with justice to hold that, where a dealer sells to his customer an article in the original package in which it is put up by the manufacturer, and the customer knows as much about the article as the dealer, and buys it without any representation from the dealer or reliance upon his judgment, knowing that there has been no inspection of it by the dealer, there is no implied warranty, although the dealer knows that the customer buys it for food. No rule of law should imply a warranty of that which it is impossible for a defendant to know by the exercise of any skill, industry or investigation, however great. In other words, neither law nor reason should require impossibilities. Accordingly it has been held that a retailer of mill feed in original packages is not liable for injury to the cattle of a customer because of glass in the food, if the customer did not rely on the retailer's judgment as to the fitness of the food, and he made no inspection of the material and had no notice of its unfitness. The situation of the retailer and consumer of packed products is properly governed by the rules of negligence law. The retailer owes to the consumer the duty to supply goods packed by reliable manufacturers and such as are without imperfections that may be discovered by an exercise of the care, skill, and experience of dealers in such products generally. This is the measure of the retailer's duty, and, if he has discharged it, he should not be mulcted in damages because injuries may be produced by unwholesomeness of the goods. As to hidden imperfections, the consumer must be deemed to have relied on the care of the packer or manufacturer or the warranty which is held to be implied by the latter."

[3] It would seem to be true, as contended by the defendant, that the evidence fails to show that Swift & Co. was the manufacturer or the packer of the merchandise. While the fact that it was received by the retail grocer in unbroken sealed packages cannot be taken to throw any light upon who manufactured or packed the product, still the statement printed on the carton that Swift & Co. were distributors thereof would seem to thus limit their connection with it. If, under the evidence, it could be taken as shown that the defendant over its name had impressed the packages with its own individual trade or proprietary brand, this would be equivalent to vouching for the product as its own. We do not think, however, that merely professing to act as distributor of a named brand of a commodity, and guaranteeing the correctness of the weight when packed, can be construed as an adoption by the defendant of the product as its own, or as throwing light upon the identity of the manufacturer or packer. There is no other evidence going to show that at the time the purchase by plaintiff was made the defendant was engaged in manufacturing or packing butter under the designated trade-name. We do think, however, that, since the evidence is undisputed that the article was actually handled by the defendant, it was incumbent on it to exculpate itself to the extent of showing that it had in good faith procured it from some reputable manufacturer, distributor, or dealer, as an article reasonably safe for the use intended especially so since there is nothing on the package to indicate who, as manufacturer or packer, was ultimately responsible for the alleged tort.

Judgment reversed.

STATE v. CROUSE. (No. 351.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §752½—If evidence, construed most favorably for state, is sufficient to convict, motion to dismiss must be overruled.

A motion to dismiss a criminal action must be determined by whether the evidence, when construed most favorably for the state, is legally sufficient to convict, and, if so, or there is any evidence in the record to sustain the counts on which defendant was convicted, exceptions to the overruling of such motion must be overruled.

2. Criminal law §552(1)—Jury's finding on circumstantial evidence not dependent entirely on belief in truth of testimony.

When a fact is to be proved by circumstantial evidence, the jury's finding is not dependent entirely on their belief in the truth of the testimony, since they must not only believe the witnesses, but also draw from their testimony the inferences arising from the facts proved.

3. Criminal law §552(1)—In drawing inferences from circumstantial evidence, jury must consider all circumstances.

In drawing inferences from circumstantial evidence, all the circumstances must be considered and weighed by the jury.

4. Intoxicating liquors §238(1) — Evidence held sufficient to require submission of issues to jury in prosecution for keeping and manufacturing for sale.

In a prosecution for manufacturing and possessing spirituous liquor for sale, evidence held sufficient to require submission of the issues to the jury, so that, on a motion to dismiss, defendant's evidence in rebuttal did not need to be considered.

5. Criminal law §762(3)—Instruction to consider location of distillery on another's land as tending to show defendant not guilty of manufacturing properly refused as invading province of jury.

In a prosecution for manufacturing and possessing spirituous liquors for sale, an instruction that the location of the distillery on the land of another should be considered as tending to show that defendant was not guilty was properly refused as invading the province of the jury and expressing an opinion on the weight and effect of the evidence.

6. Criminal law §371(10)—Testimony as to prior discovery of another still than that charged in indictment admissible to show intent.

In a prosecution for manufacturing and possessing spirituous liquors for sale, testimony as to the prior discovery near defendant's house of another still than that alleged was admissible; evidence of circumstances sufficiently connected with the main charge being competent to show purpose or intent.

7. Criminal law §1170½(5)—Questions as to whether witness found any liquor growing on his own premises, etc., in rebuttal of defendant's disclaimer of knowledge as to how liquor came to be on his premises, held harmless.

In a prosecution for manufacturing and possessing spirituous liquors for sale wherein defendant disclaimed knowledge as to how liquors came to be on his premises, questions asked on cross-examination of a neighbor as to whether he found liquor growing on his own premises or cans, kegs, and jars thereof, though immaterial, were not reversible error, being harmless.

Exceptions from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Long, Judge.

S. W. Crouse was convicted of manufacturing and having in possession for sale spirituous liquor. Defendant's motion to dismiss overruled, and he excepts. No error.

The state, to rebut defendant's disclaimer of knowledge as to how the liquor came to be on his premises, asked a neighbor on cross-examination whether he found any liquor growing on his land, or any cans, jars, or kegs thereof, to the overruling of objections to which questions defendant excepted.

The defendant was convicted of manufacturing spirituous liquor and having it in possession for the purpose of sale in violation of law. At the close of the state's evidence and again at the close of all the evidence the defendant moved to dismiss the action as in case of nonsuit. The motion was overruled. Defendant excepted. Other exceptions appear in the record.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

John D. Slawter, Swink & Hutchins, and O. O. Eard, all of Winston-Salem, for defendant.

ADAMS, J. [1] The defendant's motion to dismiss the action must be determined by the question whether the evidence, when construed most favorably for the state, is legally sufficient to convict. If it is, or if there is any evidence in the record to sustain the counts on which the defendant was convicted, the exception must be overruled. State v. Carmon, 145 N. C. 482, 59 S. E. 657; State v. Walker, 149 N. C. 528, 63 S. E. 76; State v. Carlson, 171 N. C. 823, 89 S. E. 80.

[2] In the absence of direct and positive proof the state is often required to rely upon circumstantial evidence; and, when a fact is to be proved by such evidence, the finding of the jury is not dependent entirely upon belief in the truth of the testimony, since the jurors must not only believe the witnesses, but must also draw from their testimony the inferences arising from the facts proved. Snowden v. Bell, 159 N. C. 500, 75 S. E. 721.

[3] All the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, taken in their entirety, must be considered and weighed by the jury in drawing such inferences, and in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

[4] There was evidence for the state tending to show that on June 24, 1921, Newsome, Pulliam, Scott, Flynn, Wooten, and Dunnigan, deputies of the sheriff, went to the defendant's home with a search warrant; that Newsome went down the branch on the right of the defendant's home and found a furnace under which there had been a fire; that a few hundred yards away he found tubs in a thicket, and a place from which a still had been removed; that 25 or 30 steps nearer the defendant's home and about 200 yards therefrom he saw a still (which meantime had been discovered by Pulliam) under which fire had recently been burning, and tubs in which there had been a quantity of beer; that there was a path leading from the still house toward the defendant's dwelling; that two kegs and several fruit jars which contained liquor were found, one of the kegs containing two or three gallons and the other about five; that after two of the officers had gone to the defendant's house they saw the defendant's wife go into a room and put under the bed a fruit jar which contained more than a quart of whisky, while another found a small quantity in the cellar; that the jars found in the house corresponded in size with those found in the field. There was evidence tending to show that the defendant's character was bad as to the manufacture of liquor, and there were various other circumstances tending to show his guilt. This evidence was clearly of sufficient probative force to require its submission to the jury on each count, and on a motion to dismiss the defendant's evidence in rebuttal need not be considered. State v. McMillan, 180 N. C. 742, 105 S. E. 403; State v. Bush, 177 N. C. 551, 98 S. E. 281; State v. Horner, 174 N. C. 789, 94 S. E. 291. State v. Prince, 108 S. E. 330, decided at this term, is easily distinguishable in that there was an absence of evidence which could reasonably be construed as connecting the defendant in that case with the offense charged. The motion to nonsuit and the defendant's prayer that, if the jury believed the evidence, they should acquit the defendant, and that there was no evidence tending to show that the defendant aided another in the unlawful enterprise, were properly declined.

[5] His honor could not have granted the defendant's request to instruct the jury that the location of the distillery on the land of another should be considered as tending to show that the defendant was not guilty on either count, without invading the province of the jury, and expressing an opinion upon the weight and effect of the evidence.

[6] Newsome, a witness for the state, was permitted to testify, over the defendant's objection, that about 90 days before the trial, or possibly in the preceding September, he found a still at night about 800 yards from the defendant's house, and that it had been in operation during the night. It will be borne in mind that the defendant was convicted of the manufacture of liquor and of having it in possession for the purpose of sale. If he owned or controlled or had in possession the still or the liquor, the question of his purpose or intent at once became both relevant and material. Evidence of circumstances sufficiently connected with the main charge are competent to show purpose or intent. They are regarded as part of a series of circumstances which when connected and correlated, are deemed to be competent in proof of the main fact. This principle is illustrated by the opinion State v. Stancill, 178 N. C. 686, 100 S. E.

241, in which it was held that proof of the commission of other like offenses to show the scienter, intent, or motive is generally competent when the crimes are so connected or associated that such evidence will throw light upon that question. A discussion of the authorities may be found in State v. Simons, 178 N. C. 679, 100 S. E. 239, in which the same principle is stated with clearness by the Chief Justice.

[7] The defendant's exceptions to questions propounded by the solicitor to the witness Dean on cross-examination manifestly constitute no ground for a new trial. If the evidence elicited was immaterial, it was also harmless. We have examined the defendant's objections to the testimony of the witness Swain and find them to be without merit. Upon the whole record we find no error.

No error.

STOKES v. DIXON. (No. 190.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Perpetuities § 6(1) — Clause restraining grantee's right to alienation void.

Deed conveying land to grantee "during his natural life and then to his heirs with  $\infty$  right to him the said B. (grantee) to convey the same" held void as to clause restraining grantee's right of alienation, it being repugnant to the estate conveyed, and in contravention of public policy.

2. Deeds § 128—Held to vest in grantee a fee simple under rule in Shelley's Case.

Deed conveying land to grantee "during his natural life and then to his heirs with no right to him the said B. (grantee) to convey the same" vested in grantee a fee simple, under the rule in Shelley's Case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Lyon, Judge.

Submission of controversy without action by B. H. Stokes against J. J. Dixon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepts and appeals. Affirmed.

The facts agreed are as follows:

(1) That B. H. Stokes is in possession and claims title to two certain tracts of land described in a deed dated the 11th day of March, 1910, which reads as follows:

"State of North Carolina, Craven County.

"This deed, made this the 11th day of March, 1910, by R. B. Stokes and wife, Rebecca Stokes, of Craven county and state of North Carolina, of the first part, to B. H. Stokes of Craven county and state of North Carolina, of the second part, witnesseth, that the said R. B. Stokes and Rebecca Stokes his wife, in consideration of parental love and one dollar to them paid by the said B. H. Stokes, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, have bargained and sold and by these presents do bargain, sell and convey to the said B. H. Stokes and his heirs and assigns, two certain tracts or parcels of land in No. 1 township, Craven county, state of North Carolina, described as follows: * * *

"With the exception the said R. B. Stokes reserves his life estate in the above two described tracts of land and the timber on the same. Also if R. B. Stokes dies before his wife, Rebecca Stokes, she, the said Rebecca Stokes is to have and to hold a life estate in the home place or first tract above described, it being the home place the said Rebecca's life estate to cease in case she marries again. The said home place, it being first tract described above, is hereby given to the said B. H. Stokes during his natural life and then to his heirs with no right to him the said B. H. Stokes, to convey the same, also that he is to have no part in any future division of the said R. B. Stokes land.

"To have and to hold, the aforesaid tract or parcel of land and all the privileges and appurtenances thereto, belonging to the said B. H. Stokes, and his heirs and assigns, to their only use and behoof forever.

"And the said R. B. Stokes and Rebecca Stokes, covenant to and with the said B. H. Stokes, and his heirs and assigns, that they are seized of the said premises in fee, and have a right to convey the same in fee simple; that the same are free and clear from all incumbrances, and that they will warrant and defend the said title to the same against the claims of all persons whatsoever.

"In testimony whereof the said R. B. Stokes and Rebecca Stokes, have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

Verified March 11, 1910.

(2) That R. B. Stokes and Rebecca Stokes are both dead.

(3) That B. H. Stokes and J. J. Dixon have entered into an agreement by which the said J. J. Dixon agreed to purchase the said land and pay therefor the sum of $6,800, and B. H. Stokes agreed to sell said land and convey a good and indefeasible title in fee simple.

(4) That B. H. Stokes has tendered to said J. J. Dixon a deed, conveying the said land with the usual covenants of warranty, purporting to convey a fee-simple estate, and that J. J. Dixon has refused to accept said deed or pay for the land for the reason that he is advised that said B. H. Stokes cannot convey a good title.

Upon the facts agreed his honor rendered judgment declaring the plaintiff the owner in fee of the tracts of land described in the deed, with right to convey to the defendant a title in fee simple. The defendant excepted and appealed.

Whitehurst & Borden, of New Bern, for appellant.

Moore & Dunn, of New Bern, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. [1, 2] R. B. Stokes, one of the grantors, reserved a life estate for himself in the two tracts of land described in the deed, and in case his wife Rebecca survived him, a life estate for her in the first tract, known as the home place. Both R. B. Stokes and his wife are dead, and the reservation of the life estate, for the present purpose, is inoperative. The controversy therefore depends upon the proper construction of the following paragraph:

"The said home place, it being the first tract described above, is hereby given to the said B. H. Stokes during his natural life and then to his heirs with no right to him the said B. H. Stokes, to convey the same."

The clause purporting to restrain the grantee's right of alienation is repugnant to the estate conveyed, and is void as in contravention of public policy. Munroe v. Hall, 97 N. C. 209, 1 S. E. 651; Hardy v. Galloway, 111 N. C. 520, 15 S. E. 890, 32 Am. St. Rep. 828; Pritchard v. Bailey, 113 N. C. 521, 18 S. E. 668; Latimer v. Waddell, 119 N. C. 370, 26 S. E. 122, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 668; Wool v. Fleetwood, 136 N. C. 461, 48 S. E. 785, 67 L. R. A. 444; Schwren v. Falls, 170 N. C. 251, 87 S. E. 49, L. R. A. 1916B, 1235. The grantors, then, conveyed the home place to B. H. Stokes during his natural life, and then to his heirs, and thereby vested in their grantee a fee simple under the rule in Shelley's case. Tucker v. Williams, 117 N. C. 119, 23 S. E. 90; Nichols v. Gladden, 117 N. C. 498, 23 S. E. 459; Tyson v. Sinclair, 138 N. C. 24, 50 S. E. 450, 3 Ann. Cas. 397; Smith v. Smith, 173 N. C. 124, 91 S. E. 956; Nobles v. Nobles, 177 N. PRINGLE et al. v. WINSTON-SALEM
BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N et al.
(No. 355.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

Mortgages ¶377—Where sale vacated by order of resale, trustee entitled only to allowance for trouble and advertising expenses.

Where sale under deed of trust was vacated by order of resale under C. S. § 2591, because of an advanced bid, the trustee was not entitled to commissions on the vacated sale, but only to an allowance for his trouble and expenses of advertising, which could be assessed by the clerk subject to review on appeal, or by the judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Cynthia Pringle and others against the Winston-Salem Building & Loan Association and T. W. Watson, trustee. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On January 18, 1919, the plaintiffs executed to Watson, trustee for Winston-Salem Building & Loan Association, a deed of trust to secure $800. This debt not being paid at maturity, upon the request of the beneficiary the trustee advertised the property for sale, and on May 9, 1921, sold it for $3,000. Pursuant to C. S. 2591, an advance bid being filed with the clerk, on May 12 he ordered a resale, which was advertised to take place June 4, 1921. After the resale was ordered, on June 3, 1921, the plaintiffs tendered to Watson, trustee, the amount due on the note and the cost of advertising the two sales, amounting to $735.10, but declined to pay the trustee a commission of $150, which he demanded as 5 per cent. upon the $3,000 bid, and on the same day paid into the office of the clerk of the superior court said sum of $735.10 and upon a summons issued procured a temporary restraining order against a resale, which was later continued to the final hearing by Judge Webb, who also refused the prayer of the defendant Watson to dismiss the action, and he appealed.

Jones & Clement, of Winston-Salem, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. Chapter 146, Laws 1915, and amendments, now C. S. 2591, was intended for the protection of mortgagors where sales are made under a power of sale without a decree of foreclosure by the court. In the latter cases there was always an equity to decree a resale when a substantial raise in the bid, usually 10 per cent., had been deposited in court. There being no such protection as to mortgages with power of sale, this statute was passed to extend to mortgagors whose property had been sold under power of sale without a decree of foreclosure the same opportunity of a resale, when there has been an increased bid of 10 per cent. when the bid at the first sale did not exceed $500 and of 5 per cent. where the bid of the first sale was more than $500.

This statute has been construed at this term in Re Sermons, 108 S. E. 497; not to require a report to the clerk of every sale made under a mortgage with power of sale, but that in all such cases, if the prescribed amount of the raise in bid is guaranteed, or paid, to the clerk he shall require the mortgagee or trustee to advertise and resell on 15 days' notice. In short, the condition of a mortgagor in a mortgage with a power of sale is assimilated to the condition of property sold under a decree of foreclosure so far as the right to set aside the bid at the first sale and to require a resale. Therefore the decisions upon the right of the commissioner to commissions on a sale under a decree of foreclosure is applicable in these cases.

In Pass v. Brooks, 118 N. C. 398, 24 S. E. 736, it was held that after the trustee had advertised, but before the sale day the trustor, with the knowledge and consent of the trustee, paid off the debt and interest and costs of advertisement, the trustee was not entitled to any commissions. In Fry v. Graham, 122 N. C. 773, 30 S. E. 330, where the trustee in a deed of trust with power of sale advertised the land for sale and the sale was postponed, and before the day of the adjourned sale, the debt was paid in full, the trustee can not recover commissions on the amount of the debt, but is entitled to a just allowance for time, labor, services, and expenses, and that these could be assessed in an action by the trustee for the same but in the present case, the matter being before the clerk under C. S. § 2591, by virtue of the order of resale made by him, we are of opinion that these charges can be assessed by the clerk subject to review on appeal, or by the judge in this proceeding as in Fry v. Graham.

In Whitaker v. Guano Co., 123 N. C. 370, 31 S. E. 629, it was held that where there is no sale a just allowance can be allowed the commissioner for his time, labor, and expenses. All these cases cite Boyd v. Hawkins, 17 N. C. 336. In Turner v. Boger, 126 N. C. 303, 35 S. E. 592, 49 L. R. A. 590, the above three cases were cited, and the court affirmed the dissenting opinion in Cannon v. McCape, 114 N. C. 584, 19 S. E. 703, 20 S. E. 276, in which it was pointed out that—

Originally "when property was levied on and advertised for sale under execution, if payment was made before sale, the sheriff was allowed no commission on the sale (Dawson v. Graffin, 84 N. C. 100), and it took a statute to change this (Code, § 3752), but there has been no statute as yet extending this rule to trustees or mortgagees when the debtor pays before sale. It is to be feared that such practice, if adopted, will result in oppression in very many instances."

The order of resale vacated the first sale absolutely, and under the above authorities the trustee at most would only be entitled to an allowance for his trouble and expenses of advertising, which last has been paid in to the clerk's office. The trustee claims that he was entitled to 5 per cent. upon the $3,000 which the land brought at the vacated sale. The question is not before us whether if the sale had not been set aside the trustee would have been entitled to commissions on the $3,000 or only upon the amount collected and paid over on the indebtedness, in analogy to the sale by the sheriff upon execution, who receives commission, not upon the price the property has brought, but only upon the amount collected (C. S. 3908), or like the allowance to an administrator who in selling land under a decree to make assets is entitled to commissions only on so much of the proceeds of the sale as is applied to the indebtedness of the intestate, and there are other instances. In Smith v. Frazier, 119 N. C. 158, 25 S. E. 866, it was held that formerly no commissions were allowed commissioners for making sale under judicial decree, but only a just allowance for time, labor and expenses and a decree, allowing 5 per cent. on the purchase price instead of on the amount of debt collected, was reversed. This was cited and approved in Turner v. Boger, 126 N. C. 303, 35 S. E. 592, 49 L. R. A. 590, which intimated that by analogy to sales in partition the allowance (even when the sale is not set aside) might follow the rate allowed by that statute, now C. S. 3896. Ray v. Banks, 120 N. C. 389, 27 S. E. 28; Williamson v. Bitting, 159 N. C. 321, 74 S. E. 808.

Though this matter is not strictly before us, and we do not decide it, it would seem that the spirit of the statute is to protect mortgagors, like defendants in executions, against the payment of commissions on more than the debt that is collected by the sale.

The restraining order against the resale was properly continued, and the amount of allowance to the trustee for his labor and trouble can be fixed by the judge at the final hearing, or, if so advised, application for such allowance can be made by the trustee to the clerk with the right of appeal.

Affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. RANDOLPH & C. RY. CO. et al. (No. 332.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Railroads  $\S$ 259(1)—Lessor and lessee jointly liable for lessee's torts.

Lessor and lessee of a railroad are jointly and in the same degree liable for lessee's torts.

2. Assignment  $\S$ 31—Landlord and tenant  $\S$ 20—"Lease" and "assignment" distinguished.

The elements of a lease are the creation of a lesser estate from the greater, the reservation of rent, the retention of some interest or estate after the termination of the term, and the recognition of lessor's ownership of the property, while an assignment transfers the whole estate and reserves no rent nor any interest in the property assigned.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assignment; Lease.]

3. Railroads  $\S$ 259(3)—Agreement held a lease so as to render parties jointly liable for injuries.

An agreement between the successor in interest of a lessee of railroad property and a sublessee thereof demising it to the latter for a term less than that for which part of it was acquired from the owner, requiring sublessee to make no traffic arrangements with any other railroad without grantor's consent, to pay taxes and insurance, to return the property on expiration of the term, and indemnify grantor against loss or damage arising out of the operation of the road, and reserving the right to declare a forfeiture on nonpayment of rent, was a lease, and not an assignment, and therefore the parties were jointly and severally liable to one injured at a crossing.

4. Death ⚡62—Dying declarations of one struck at crossing held admissible under statute.

In view of C. S. § 160, as amended by Laws 1919, c. 29, declaring dying declarations of deceased as to the cause of death by wrongful act admissible in like manner as in criminal actions for homicide, a statement of an automobilist struck by a train at a public crossing: "I am broken all to pieces. I want you to see to it that they pay you for this"—was competent as expressing deceased's conviction that death was rapidly approaching, and as being an integral part of his dying declaration.

5. Constitutional law ⚡109—Dying declaration in action for death from wrongful act held admissible, though made prior to law authorizing admission.

A dying declaration by one struck by a train at a railroad crossing, though made prior to the enactment of the amendment of 1919 (Laws 1919, c. 29) to C. S. § 160, authorizing the admission of dying declarations of deceased in actions for death caused by wrongful act in like manner as in criminal actions for homicide, was admissible, the statute being a general one changing the rule of evidence, in which no one has a vested interest, and which the lawmaking power can extend, alter, or repeal at will.

6. Railroads ⚡347(7)—Evidence as to condition of track at crossing held admissible.

In an action for the death of an automobilist struck by a train at a public crossing, evidence as to the condition of the track and rails was admissible to show that death was proximately caused by negligence in failing to maintain warning notice, and failure to remove soil from the track and clear undergrowth obstructing the view of the cars which were pushed in front of the engine without warning.

7. Railroads ⚡330(3)—Negligence not imputed to traveler induced to proceed by omission of warning at obstructed crossing.

If a traveler's view is obstructed or his hearing of an approaching train is prevented, and especially if this is done by the fault of the railroad company and the failure to warn him, and, being lulled into security, he attempts to cross the track and is injured, having used his faculties as best he could under the circumstances, negligence will not be imputed to him, but to the company; its failure to warn him being regarded as the proximate cause of the injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Horton, Judge.

Action by Lena S. Williams, administratrix, against the Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company and the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From a verdict for plaintiff, defendants appeal and from an order setting aside the verdict and entering a nonsuit as to the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, plaintiff and defendant, Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company, appeal. Order striking out verdict reversed, and judgment entered for plaintiff against both defendants.

This was an action for the death of the defendant at a railroad crossing at Cameron, N. C., caused by a train which was being operated at that time by the defendant Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company, lessee of the defendant. Both defendants answered, denying negligence and pleading contributory negligence, and the defendant Seaboard Air Line R. R. Co. denying that it was liable as lessor. The jury found upon the issues submitted that the plaintiff's intestate was killed by the negligence of the defendants, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and assessed damages.

The court set aside the verdict on the second issue as against the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company as a matter of law, and entered a nonsuit as to it. The said company, having, however, assigned errors on the trial to the evidence and the charge, appealed, as did also the Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company, and the plaintiff.

Williams & Williams, of Sanford, Brogden & Bryant, of Durham, W. S. Roberson, of Chapel Hill, and A. L. Brooks, of Greensboro, for plaintiff.

Walter H. Neal, of Laurinburg, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for defendant Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co.

U. L. Spence and R. L. Burns, both of Carthage, for defendant Randolph & C. Ry. Co.

OLARK, C. J. In August, 1917, the Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company were operating a railroad between Cameron and Carthage in Moore county, which crosses the National Highway at right angles just inside the corporate limits of the town of Cameron at a point where the railroad track crosses this highway from a deep cut, which was 8 to 10 feet high on the north side and 12 to 15 feet high on the other. On the banks of this cut for some distance on each side of the railroad bushes, trees, and thick growth had been permitted to grow, obstructing the view of the approaching train.

The plaintiff's intestate, driving along this highway on August 22, 1917, in an automobile going south, crossed a bridge north of the railroad, and was approaching this crossing. The railroad train was approaching the crossing from the west with a box car at the front end nearest the crossing, then two or three gondola cars, then the passenger car, and the engine attached to the rear was pushing the cars over the crossing at a speed of 8 to 10 miles per hour, the engine being in the cut. There was evidence that the engineer did not ring the bell, blow the whistle, or give any warning of the approach as the train emerged from the cut on the west and entered on the highway. The train collided with the automobile, and plaintiff's intestate sustained severe injuries, from which he died next day.

On August 23, 1888, the Carthage Railway Company leased its roadbed franchise, etc., to the Raleigh & Augusta Air Line Railway Company for 99 years. In 1890 the latter company leased the property acquired from the Carthage Railway Company, together with its own franchise rights, powers, and other privileges and some other property to W. C. Petty for a term of 97 years. Petty operated the road for some time, and after his death the trustees named in his will in 1906 leased all the property acquired under his lease as above to the defendant Randolph & Cumberland Railroad Company. In 1901 the defendant Seaboard Air Line Railway Company succeeded to the rights of the Raleigh & Augusta Railroad Company.

On September 20, 1907, the defendant Seaboard Air Line Railway Company and the defendant Randolph & Cumberland Railroad Company executed a lease agreement, set out in the record, releasing Petty's estate and substituting the defendant Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company as lessee of the property, specifically readopting and reaffirming all stipulations and terms of the lease from the Raleigh & Augusta Air Line Railway Company and Petty, expressly providing that the defendant Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company pay rent direct to the defendant Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, and should make no traffic arrangements or business connection with any other railroad company except with the written consent of the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, and that the latter may declare the term forfeited and re-enter upon the property, and that the Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company shall indemnify the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company against loss by reason of damage arising out of the operation of the road, and return the property to the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company at the expiration of the term.

Appeal by the Plaintiff.

This appeal presents for review the action of the judge in setting aside as a matter of law the verdict as to the second issue which held the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company liable, and his instruction to the jury under which they found that the liability of the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company was secondary, and entered judgment of nonsuit as to that company.

[1] In these particulars there was error. This court has repeatedly held that the lessor and lessee of a railway company are jointly liable for the torts of its lessee, and both defendants, the Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company and the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company are liable equally and in the same degree, to the plaintiff.

In Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 321, the court held:

"The defendant company, leasing the use of its road or permitting the use of it by another company, remains liable for the consequences of the mismanagement of the train in charge of the servants of the latter and the injury thence resulting to the same extent as if such mismanagement was the act or neglect of its own servants operating its own train."

In a very full opinion the court says, in Logan v. Railway, 116 N. C. 947, 948, 21 S. E. 961, that—

"The lessor company * * * remains liable for the performance of public duties to private parties for the nondelivery of goods received by it for delivery, and for all acts done by the lessee in the operation of the road, notwithstanding the lease is authorized by the lessor's charter." * * * No matter how many leases and subleases may be made, the law attaches to the actual exercise of the privilege of carrying passengers and freight the compensatory obligation to the public to use ordinary care for the safety both of persons and property so transported. * * * On the other hand, the carrier, who simply substitutes, with the consent of the state, another in his place, cannot establish his own right of exemption from responsibility for the wrongs of the substitute, unless he can show, not only explicit authority to lease the property, but to rid itself of such responsibility."

In Harden v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 362, 40 S. E. 187, 55 L. R. A. 784, 85 Am. St. Rep. 747, in which case the authorities are collected and approved the court said:

"If a railroad corporation could relieve itself of liability by leasing, it would follow that leases could be made to another corporation with no tangible assets—as, indeed, the lessee in this case, if a foreign corporation, has none in this state—leaving the travelers and shippers over its line, the general public, and its employees alike, without recourse on the property of the corporation which was chartered to operate the road, and which is left in receipt of the rent, which might readily be made high enough to cover the profits. Thus the company would, by a device of a lease, receive the profits without incurring the liabilities of its business."

Among the many cases to the same effect besides Aycock v. Railroad, supra, and Logan v. Railroad, supra, and Harden v. Railroad, supra, will be found Tillett v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1043, 24 S. E. 111; James v.

Railroad, 121 N. C. 528, 28 S. E. 537, 46 L. R. A. 306; Norton v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 910, 29 S. E. 886; Kinney v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 961, 30 S. E. 813; Benton v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 1009, 30 S. E. 333; Pierce v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 93, 32 S. E. 399, 44 L. R. A. 316; Perry v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 471, 39 S. E. 27; Id., 129 N. C. 333, 40 S. E. 191; Raleigh v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 265, 40 S. E. 2; Smith v. Railroad, 130 N. C. 344, 42 S. E. 139; Id., 131 N. C. 616, 42 S. E. 976; Brown v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 455, 42 S. E. 911; Mabry v. Railroad, 139 N. C. 388, 52 S. E. 124; Parker v. Railroad, 150 N. C. 433, 64 S. E. 186; Zachary v. Railroad, 156 N. C. 496, 72 S. E. 858; Railroad v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 258, 34 Sup. Ct. 305, 58 L. Ed. 591, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 159; and there are many others since, among them Mitchell v. Lumber Co., 178 N. C. 645, 97 S. E. 628; Hill v. Director General of Railroads, 178 N. C. 607, 101 S. E. 376.

[2, 3] In this case the relationship of lessor and lessee is fully shown by the allegations in the complaint and the admissions in the answer and the lease contract as set out in the record, in which there are all the elements of a lease, i. e., the creation of a lesser estate from the greater; the reservation of rent, the retention of some interest or estate after the termination of the term, and the recognition by the terms of the lease of the ownership of the demised property by the lessor. A lease is distinguished from an assignment in that the latter is a conveyance which transfers the whole and entire estate. An assignment makes no reservation of rent, and reserves no interest in the property assigned. In this case, the term for which the property was demised is less than the term for which part of the property was acquired from the Carthage Railway Company; and the terms of the lease create the direct relationship of lessor and lessee; substituting the Randolph & Cumberland Railroad Company for the former lessee; the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company expressly retains absolute control over the operation of the road by the Randolph & Cumberland Railway Company, its lessee, and the right and power to say with whom, how, when, or on what terms the Randolph & Cumberland Railroad Company may make traffic arrangements or business connections with any other railroad, thus securing to the lessor the benefit of operating the road, and protects the lessor against payment of taxes levied against the demised property and franchise rights, requiring the lessee to pay the same.

The lessor by its contract requires that the demised property shall be returned to it upon expiration of the terms specified, and that during the lease it shall be insured for its benefit, thus recognizing a present interest in the term. The lease demises the "rights, powers, privileges, easements and franchises" of the lessor, who also reserves the right to declare a forfeiture of the term and make re-entry and retake the property demised upon nonpayment of rent, and the lessee agrees to indemnify the lessor against loss or damage arising out of the operation of the road by the lessee.

The cases relied upon by the defendant (Dunn v. Railroad Co., 141 N. C. 521, 54 S. E. 416, and Gregg v. Wilmington, 155 N. C. 18, 70 S. E. 1070), differ radically as to the facts from the case at bar, and are not in point.

There being a lease, the court erred in charging the jury that the liability of the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company was secondary. The liability of lessor and lessee is joint and several, and in equal degree, and there was also error in setting aside the verdict as against the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company as a matter of law.

Appeal by Defendants.

In view of what has just been said, the appeal of the two defendants as to the other exceptions should be considered jointly.

[4] The defendants except to the evidence as to the physical condition of the plaintiff's intestate and the dying declarations made by him a short time before his death. The Legislature of 1919 (Laws 1919, c. 29) amended C. S. § 160, which authorizes recovery of damages for death caused by wrongful act, by adding to said section the following clause:

"In all actions brought under this section the dying declarations of the deceased as to the cause of his death shall be admissible in evidence in like manner and under the same rules as dying declarations of deceased in criminal actions for homicide are now received in evidence."

This amending clause has been construed in Tatham v. Mfg. Co., 180 N. C. 627, 105 S. E. 423, in which the power of the Legislature to so enact was sustained in an opinion by Mr. Justice Hoke. The circumstances under which dying declarations are competent in criminal actions are set out fully in State v. Mills, 91 N. C. 594, which has been repeatedly cited and approved since. See citations in Anno. Ed.

The entire dying declaration of plaintiff's intestate is as follows:

"I am going to die. I am broken all to pieces. I want you to see to it that they pay you for this. I did not see the train. I did not know that it was anywheres near until my car was going over."

The attendant circumstances were fully set out in evidence, and leave no question as to the death of the plaintiff's intestate being caused by the collision of the train with the car which he was driving. He died on the following day. That part of the declaration to which the defendants except:

—was competent as expressing the conviction of the deceased that he knew that death was rapidly approaching, and that he had abandoned all hope, and as being also an integral part of the dying declaration.

[5] It can make no difference that the act authorizing the admission of dying declarations in such action was passed after this occurrence. It is a general statute changing the rule of evidence, in which no one has a vested interest, and which the lawmaking power can extend, alter, or repeal at will.

[6] The exceptions as to the evidence showing the condition of the track and rails at the crossing at the time of the injury to plaintiff's intestate cannot be sustained. This evidence tended to show that the death was proximately caused by the want of care and the negligence on the part of the defendants, as alleged in the complaint, in failing to maintain at said public crossing some notice to warn the public and failure to remove the soil from the rails and track and to clear away and keep down the undergrowth and other obstructions which concealed from view the railroad track at the point where it crossed the public highway; also failure to sound the whistle or ring the bell or give other suitable warning as the box car in front of said train was being pushed over the crossing at a point where its approach was obscured by the growth of trees and other obstructions, and by pushing the train of cars in front of the engine across the public highway in the town of Cameron, without giving warning, and when those in charge of said train could not see the danger to plaintiff's intestate and avoid injuring him.

[7] The duty of the respective parties at a crossing have been so often stated by this court that it would be supererogation to do more than give the summary of the rules governing such occasion as stated by the late Mr. Justice Allen in the recent case of Perry v. Railroad, 180 N. C. 295, 104 S. E. 675:

If the view of the traveler "is obstructed or his hearing an approaching train is prevented, and especially if this is done by the fault of the defendant, and the company's servants fail to warn him of its approach, and, induced by this failure of duty, which has lulled him into security, he attempts to cross the track and is injured, having used his faculties as best he could, under the circumstances, to ascertain if there is any danger ahead, negligence will not be imputed to him, but to the company, its failure to warn him being regarded as the proximate cause of any injury he received."

There was evidence fairly submitted to the jury to justify their finding this state of facts, and the charge is almost in the exact language of the court in Perry v. Railroad, which followed the previous decisions in Goff v. Railroad, 179 N. C. 216, 102 S. E. 320; Shepard v. Railroad, 166 N. C. 544, 82 S. E. 872; Jenkins v. Railroad, 155 N. C. 203, 71 S. E. 213; Hinkle v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 472, 13 S. E. 884, 26 Am. St. Rep. 581.

Upon examination of the entire case, the court directs that the order striking out the verdict on the second issue must be reversed and the verdict on that issue reinstated; and judgment must be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the verdict against both defendants, jointly and severally, without any priority as to liability between them.

In appeal by plaintiff error. In appeal by defendants no error.

McFADDEN v. ANDERSON MOTOR CO.
(No. 10734.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

Municipal corporations  $\S$  706(6)—Whether automobile was driven at excessive speed on wet pavement in danger zone held for jury.

In action for injuries to girl, struck by defendant's automobile while crossing street, question of whether automobile was being driven at an excessive rate of speed on wet pavement within danger zone surrounding approach to public school held for the jury.

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by Aline McFadden, by her guardian ad litem, Allie McFadden against the Anderson Motor Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The reasons assigned by the trial court for granting a nonsuit are stated in the "case and exceptions" as follows:

"A nonsuit is never granted, if there is any evidence at all to sustain the allegation—specifications of negligence set out in the complaint. Realizing that, if there is any evidence at all to go to the jury of negligence, I have had the stenographer read over to me practically all of the testimony of Mr. Pressly, who is the only witness that testified anything about this accident. I can't find in his testimony any evidence of negligence at all; unless we could assume from the fact that one was hit by an automobile, that the automobile was negligently run, why, then there is certainly no evidence of negligence here. The law doesn't raise the presumption of negligence on account of the fact that the automobile was running. Now, Mr. Pressly, in his testimony, says he didn't see any car at all; the only information he got was from some one else who told him; that wasn't competent. I don't know that it was ruled out, but it got in, what this boy had said. He said that he didn't see any car; the only thing he saw was the girl lying down on the right-hand rail, going in the direction the car was going; he was going on the right-hand rail of the street car line. He says he doesn't know whether the car stopped or not, as he didn't look for any car, and didn't see it. As far as his testimony, the car may have stopped at once, and may have reversed back, turned around; but he does say, as soon as he looked, he saw this girl the instant after it occurred; he saw the girl lying in that position. He went back there, and then saw the car turn around, as he expressed it, after he came back. As a matter of fact, he doesn't testify it is the same car. I suppose the inference would be it was the same car. He does say he testified the car stopped. He didn't see any car; didn't pay any attention to whether there was a warning given, or horn blown, or not; he doesn't know; he doesn't remember hearing any. He doesn't say there was one, and therefore there is no testimony on his part that the driver was driving that car in a negligent way at all; absolutely none. Now, cars have a right to drive; they have the right to drive in the street that way. From all we know, from the testimony, the car may have been going at five, six or even four miles; no testimony to the contrary. Now, counsel argues, because he struck this child, he must not have been observing a sufficient outlook. That doesn't follow as a matter of law because, if that were true, the law would be, the mere fact of injury raises the presumption that there was negligence of the driver of the car. That is not the law.

"I have asked counsel to try to point out to me any act of negligence but none have been able to show it. I have examined the testimony for myself. Of course, if there was a negligent driving of that car, there ought to be damages for the plaintiff; but you can't give damages to the plaintiff unless there is negligence upon which to predicate that. Therefore, as I am going to grant a nonsuit in this case, might want in this, in form of nonsuit or in direction of verdict and have granted motion, that merely upon the accident so far as the testimony is offered, it may be that another suit could supply the proof that is absolutely lacking in this case. I can't see where there is any negligence at all. I am obliged to do it; I regret to do it but I am obliged to grant a nonsuit in this case. You just take a simple order: Nonsuit on ground of lack of proof."

J. Harry Foster, of Rock Hill, and Thomas F. McDow, of York, for appellant.

Wilson & Wilson, of Rock Hill, and McDonald & McDonald, of Winnsboro, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action for $20,000 damages on account of personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff in being struck by an automobile of the defendant at Rock Hill, S. C., February 18, 1919. The case was tried at York, S. C., at December term, 1920, before Judge McIver and a jury. At the close of the testimony for the plaintiff the circuit judge ordered a nonsuit, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff, a schoolgirl, was on her way to school, and while upon the street near the school was run over by an automobile of the defendant, operated by one Frank Hall. The circumstances of the collision are very meagerly detailed in the testimony, but there was sufficient evidence of the negligent operation of the car to require the submission of the issue to the jury, and the order of nonsuit was erroneous.

The witness Pressly testified that he was walking on the north side of East Main street, and was in the act of crossing Reid street, which intersects East Main; that he was with a young man, Sam Fant; that Sam Fant exclaimed, "There goes Frank's car," and immediately thereafter, "Watch out there; he is going to hit that little girl." Pressly looked around, the car was out of sight, and the little girl was lying on the ground. If Fant could see the danger, why could Hall have not seen it? If the car was out of sight when Pressly looked around, its speed was a question of fact for the jury. The fact that Hall did not stop means either that he did not see the little girl (upon the presumption of his humane feelings), or that he was going at such a speed on a wet pavement that he could not stop in time to avoid the collision, all of which were questions for the jury to decide. It was also for them to decide whether, under the circumstances, within the danger zone which should surround the approach to a public school, the driver exercised that degree of care which was required of him. The wet street, the presence of school children, the unobstructed view, were elements which the jury had the right to consider in determining the presence or absence of negligence.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). For the reasons assigned by his honor, Judge McIver, in granting nonsuit, I think that the exceptions should be overruled and the judgment affirmed.

SAMS v. SAMS et al.*Ex parte SAMS.

(No. 10716.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Husband and wife  $\Leftrightarrow$ 283(2)—Husband held guilty of desertion.

Where plaintiff wife learned a few days after her marriage that two days before the marriage her husband had conveyed away nearly if not all his real estate, worth from $75,000 to $139,000, to relatives, in contemplation of his marriage, and thereafter he rented out his house and sent her to another home without paying her board there, and, on her going to her own home until he could provide a home for her, failed to do so, held that he was guilty of deserting her.

2. Limitation of actions  $\Leftrightarrow$ 100(10)—Suit to set aside deeds to husband's relatives held barred.

Wife's action in April, 1920, to set aside as in fraud of her rights her husband's deeds to relatives shortly before his marriage in 1906 was barred by limitations, where she knew the facts in 1906.

3. Husband and wife  $\Leftrightarrow$ 283(2)—Offer to take wife back not sufficient to defeat alimony.

Where a husband's conduct had been consistently calculated to keep his wife away from his home, he could not escape payment of alimony on the ground he had offered to take her back, where the offer did not stop at that point, but alleged that he had always been willing to allow her to return, thereby indicating that his attitude remained unchanged, so that his offer could not be deemed bona fide.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Allendale County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

Action by Moylin M. Sams against D. Sams and others, in which Pauline O. Sams and others petitioned to be made parties, but their petition was refused. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal, and petitioners also appeal. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

James M. Patterson, of Allendale, for appellants.

R. P. Searsen, of Allendale, and Harley & Blatt, of Barnwell, for respondent.

FRAZER, J. The record shows:

"The plaintiff, Moylin M. Sams, and the defendant D. Sams are husband and wife. They were married on February 14, 1906. The defendant Miss Emma L. Sams is a sister of the defendant D. Sams. The petitioners, Emmie C. Sams, Annie Lou Sams, and Pauline O. Sams, are children of the defendant D. Sams by a former marriage. For 13 or 14 years the said husband and wife have been living separate and apart.

"In April, 1920, the plaintiff, Mrs. Moylin M. Sams, brought this action asking for the following relief:

"(1) For a legal separation between herself and her husband.

"(2) For reimbursement for the money which she has spent on her support during the years of separation up to the commencement of this action.

"(3) For alimony during the lifetime of the defendant D. Sams.

"(4) That the courts declare fraudulent and void as against her rights certain deeds made by the said D. Sams, conveying all of his real estate to his brother and sister, the defendants Miss Emma L. Sams and R. O. Sams.

"(5) For temporary alimony pending this action, and suit money and attorney's fees."

The plaintiff, a young lady then about 22 years old, taught school in Allendale county, in this state, and among her pupils were the three daughters of the defendant. For the space of about 1 year the plaintiff boarded in the home of the defendant. The plaintiff and the defendant became engaged to be married, and were married, on the 14th day of February, 1906. It seems that a few days after the marriage, the plaintiff learned that her husband, two days before the marriage, to wit, on February 12, 1906, had conveyed away nearly if not all of his real estate. It is alleged and not denied that these conveyances were made in contemplation of marriage and to get the property out of the reach of any possible interference by the plaintiff when she should become his wife. The property conveyed is estimated to be worth anywhere from $75,000 to $139,750. The master recommended judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for arrears of alimony in the sum of $7,925 and found that the deeds, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, are a legal fraud; recommends $125 per month for future alimony, and also temporary alimony and counsel fees. From the findings of the master, the defendant appeals to the court of common pleas. The three daughters asked to be made parties, but their petition was refused. With some slight modifications not material here, the report of the master was affirmed. From this judgment the defendant appealed.

[1] I. The first assignment of error is that there was error in holding that the husband deserted his wife. This assignment of error cannot be sustained. The desertion, to a woman of any sort of refinement of feeling, was absolute. The defendant conveyed his property by conveyances that did not deprive him of its use, but only sought to prevent the accruing of any rights to the wife. These deeds were recorded, and said to all the world:

"I am about to marry a woman in whose honesty and fair dealings I have not the slightest confidence."

It was a cruel blow, uncalled for, unprovoked, wholly gratuitous. Up to that time she had done nothing either good or bad. It is true the wife told her husband, when she found it out, that she did not care to live with one who had no confidence in her. She did, however, live with him as long as he permitted her to do so. The rebuke was mild, but his guilty conscience made of it an unpardonable offense. He tells her that he has rented out his house, and has provided that she shall board with a Mrs. Peeples in Allendale, while he makes other arrangements. The defendant leaves her there, and goes off for a time. The plaintiff finds that she is not a boarder, but a guest. Mrs. Sams is in the position of one who is the recipient of charity. When her husband returns she tells him she wants to go back to her own family. The time of her stay with her family is not fixed. Neither is the time fixed for the opening of a new home. It is true also that Mr. Sams reserved some rooms in his home for his use, but he did not tell his wife that she might return to the home from which he had taken her. If he had told her to return to the home, it would have been to add insult to injury. It is suggested now that to return to the home was her right and duty. Suppose she had done so, she would have been met on this trial with the indisputable fact that she had returned to a house occupied by an unmarried man. When she had been carefully informed by her husband's letters that her husband's presence at that place, as her protector, was uncertain, she would have lost her reputation as well as her alimony. He took her from his house, left her in Allendale an object of charity; sent her back to her family; never notified her that he was ready for her return; constantly advised her that his movements were uncertain. The defendant husband deserted his wife, the plaintiff, and she was entitled to at least the alimony accorded to her by the judgment appealed from and the counsel fees.

[2] II. The next assignment of error is that the deeds cannot be set aside in this proceeding on account of the statute of limitations. This assignment of error must be sustained. Mrs. Sams knew the facts in 1904, and it is now too late to bring an action to set aside the deeds. The statute needs no construction, but, if it does, it will be found in Amaker v. New, 33 S. C. 28, 11 S. E. 386, 8 L. R. A. 687, followed by a line of cases. There are two avenues of relief. This one is closed.

[3] III. The appellant claims that the alimony prayed for is defeated by his offer to take his wife back. That might have been sufficient if he had stopped there. He did not stop there, however, but alleges that he has always been willing to allow her to return. If his attitude towards his wife is the same that it has been, we are forced to the conclusion that the offer is not bona fide.

The judgment as to alimony is affirmed. The judgment in so far as it sets aside the deeds in this action is reversed.

WORKMAN et al. v. COPELAND et al.* (No. 10729.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Specific performance  $\S$  25—Equity will not decree execution of a written lease in absence of contract for one.

Where there was no agreement for a written lease, equity will not require the execution of one.

2. Specific performance  $\S$  39—Parol lease for five years void and unenforceable.

Under the statutes a parol lease for five years is void, and unenforceable in equity.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Workman and another against J. W. Copeland, Sr., and another. From decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Simpson, Cooper & Babb, of Laurens, for appellants.

Dial & Todd and F. P. McGowan, all of Laurens, for respondents.

FRASER, J. In the view that this court takes of this case, very few words are necessary to determine it. The Copeland Company were conducting a mercantile business at Clinton, S. C. The stores occupied by the company were the individual property of the defendant J. W. Copeland, who was the president and the person who conducted the negotiations between the parties. The plaintiffs claim that by a parol agreement W. H. Workman, on behalf of himself and others, bought the stock of goods and made a lease of the storehouses for a period of five years. Before the end of the first year, Mr. Copeland sold the storehouses to his codefendant. The codefendant denied the lease, and demanded increased rent after the expiration of a year. This suit was brought for specific performance.

Appellant's argument says:

"There is only one question, Was it error to refuse specific performance of this contract; it being one in parol to give a lease of buildings for a longer time than one year?"

Due consideration will show clearly how impossible it is to grant the relief demanded. The plaintiff W. H. Workman in his testimony stated:

"It never occurred to me to have the lease put in writing till after he talked about selling. I did not know that a verbal lease for five years was not good till later on, when some of them claimed it was not good, when he began to talk about wanting the building."

[1, 2] There being no agreement for a written lease, the court cannot require Mr. Copeland to execute a written lease. The courts may require a person to perform a contract he has made. There was no agreement for a written lease, and the court is powerless to require one. It is equally clear that a parol lease for five years is void under the statutes, and the court cannot enforce a parol contract that the statutes say is void.

There are other insuperable obstacles in the plaintiffs' way, but this is enough.

Let the report of the special referee and the decree of the trial judge be reported.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). Appeal from a decree of the circuit court, confirming the report of the special master, recommending that the motion of the defendants, made at the conclusion of the testimony for the plaintiffs, to dismiss the complaint, be granted. No testimony on behalf of the defendants was received.

The action is for the specific performance of an alleged parol agreement entered into between J. W. Copeland and W. H. Workman, on February 20, 1919, covering two storehouses in the town of Clinton for five years from that date at a rental of $500 per annum.

The testimony for the plaintiffs (which was alone before the court) tended to establish the following facts:

A corporation known as the Copeland Company, of which the defendant J. W. Copeland was principal stockholder and manager, in the year 1919 was engaged (as it had been for several years) in an extensive mercantile business, occupying two storehouses in Clinton, which were the individual property of J. W. Copeland. They fronted on the principal street of the town, and occupied a most desirable location for business. In February of that year negotiations opened up between Copeland and Workman looking to a purchase by Workman of the hardware stock of goods in one of the stores. The trade was concluded by an agreement, all verbal, by which Copeland agreed to sell to Workman the stock of goods at 90 cents on the dollar, and to lease him the two stores at $500 per annum for five years, as the special master finds:

"I find also that the lease of those buildings was an inducement to Mr. Workman's entering into this contract, and that under the testimony if it had not been for the fact that he thought he would get possession of the buildings for five years, he would not have purchased the stock of goods."

Workman did not want to take the smaller store, but upon Copeland's insistence agreed to do so; he is positive in his declaration that the location was extremely desirable, that there was no other available place open to him, and that, if he had not been able to secure the lease for five years, he would not have embarked in the business at all; that he was setting up two of his nephews in business and that the acquisition of a stock of goods, without a place of business, was a matter not to be thought of. An inventory of the stock was taken. Workman complied with the terms of the purchase, settling with Copeland in full, and was put into possession of both the stock of goods and the two stores; that he or the firm or corporation subsequently organized paid the rent, $41.66 per month, regularly, until February 19, 1920. In December, 1919, Copeland notified Workman that his lease would expire on February 19, 1920. Workman replied promptly that he had a verbal contract with him for five years; that "this was the agreement when we bought the stock of goods as a part of the sale." Copeland did not reply until February 12, 1920, repeating, without reference to Workman's letter, his former statement as to the expiration of the lease, and on the 21st, the day after the year was up, notified Workman that he was a tenant at will at $60 per month. On March 19, 1920, Copeland conveyed the two stores to the defendant Tribble Company. The latter notified Workman on March 22, 1920, that they had bought the stores, and demanded possession by April 1st. They notified Workman that they wanted $75 per month for one store and $50 for the other, a mild increase of $1,000 per annum over the rent previously paid by Workman. Workman refused to give up possession or to pay the increased rent. The defendant D. E. Tribble Company was notified, before they complied with their trade with Copeland for the stores, that Workman was claiming possession under his verbal lease as stated.

After finding the facts practically as above, the special master concluded: (1) That the parol lease in excess of one year was void for the excess of one year, under section 3502 of the Code; (2) that the parol lease was void under the statute of frauds (sections 3735-3737 of the Code); (3) that in selling the stock of goods Copeland was acting for the Copeland Company, and in making the lease he was acting for himself individually; that the sale and lease could not therefore constitute an entire contract, as there were two separate contracts, made by two separate entities, having no legal connection with each other; (4) that the parol lease was not taken out of the statute of frauds by part performance, for the reason that the possession by the lessee was referable to that part of the contract which was valid, the lease for a year, and that the payment of the rent was made by the month and not by the year. He gives no reason for this distinction, or why it should not be considered as evidence of part performance, if in fact it was made upon the parol lease for five years; (5) that there was no written assignment of the lease to the partnership of Stanton & Johnson or to the corporation Workman Company, and that Workman Company, to establish their right to possession, must show, not only a lease originally valid, but an assignment thereof complying with section 3736 of the Code.

The circuit judge in a decree of more amplified form confirmed the report of the special master upon the grounds above stated, which will form the basis of observations to follow, and from his decree the plaintiffs have appealed.

It is conceded that Copeland did make an oral agreement with Workman that he should have the occupation of the stores for five years at a rental for the two of $500 per annum. The testimony is all one way as to that fact, and the master so finds, to which the defendants have filed no exception. It is also conceded that in reliance upon that agreement, and upon the further agreement that Copeland would give him a lease, Workman took over one of the stores which he did not need, went into possession of the hardware stock and both houses, paid the purchase price of the goods in full, embarked in a mercantile venture of great risk, with two young men whom he was setting up in business (which he would not have done without the assurance of a suitable location), and regularly paid the rent called for by the agreement. For the purposes of this appeal (there having been a motion to dismiss granted before the defendant put up any testimony) these facts are taken for granted, as being admitted by the defendants.

The question is, Shall the defendant Copeland be permitted to repudiate his agreement, and under the cloak of statutory protection perpetrate a gross wrong upon Workman? So far as I am concerned he shall not be, if there is any law in the land to prevent it.

There is no question but that under section 3502 of the Code a parol lease for more than a year does not confer upon the lessee a right of possession for more than 12 months, and that all such leases shall be understood to be for one year only.

It is provided in section 3735 that a parol lease for more than a year shall have the force and effect of an estate at will only.

Under section 3737, no action can be brought upon a parol lease for any length of time, one year or less or more. Davis v. Pollock, 36 S. C. 544, 15 S. E. 718.

There seems to be a conflict between the provisions of sections 3502 and 3735. In the former, a parol lease for more than a year creates a lease for a year; in the latter, an estate at will.

Notwithstanding the imperative terms of inhibition contained in section 3737, against the institution of an action upon a contract of the character there mentioned, not in writing, the court of equity will allow it under circumstances which would amount to a fraud if denied. As is declared in 2 Story, Eq. (14th Ed.) p. 423:

"The distinct ground upon which courts of equity interfere in cases of this sort is that otherwise one party would be enabled to practice a fraud upon the other; and it could never be the intention of the statute to enable any party to commit such a fraud with impunity. Indeed fraud in all cases constitutes an answer to the most solemn acts and conveyances; and the objects of the statute are promoted, instead of being obstructed, by such a jurisdiction for discovery and relief."

The ground on which courts of equity proceed, in holding that part performance of a contract within the statute of frauds takes the case out of the statute, is that it would amount to a fraud on the party who, in reliance on the contract and pursuant thereto, has partly performed it, to permit the other party to refuse performance on his part. The enforcement is made in harmony with the principle that courts of equity will not allow the statute of frauds to be used as an instrument of fraud. This being the basis of the doctrine, it follows that nothing can be regarded as a part performance, to take a verbal contract out of the operation of the statute, which does not place the party in the situation which is a fraud upon him unless the contract be executed. The partial performance must be such as would prevent the court from restoring the promise to the situation in which he was when the agreement was made." 25 R. C. L. 259,

As Judge Story remarks:

"That they [the principles of equity] do, however, interfere in some cases within the reach of the statute, is equally certain. But they do so, not upon any notion of any right to dispense with it, but for the purpose of administering equities subservient to its true objects, or collateral to it and independent of it."

I can see no reason why sections 3502 or 3735 should be invested with a sanctity, not possessed by section 3737, which would relieve them from the application of so just a rule.

As long as the parol contract stands in its original form, and the proceeding is one at law, sections 3502 and 3735 have full force; but in equity they are subject to the same great rules for enforcing justice as prevail in and are the pride of a court of equity.

In 25 R. C. L. 284, it is declared:

"Thus if a tenant has entered into possession under an oral agreement for a lease and has paid rent, incurred expenses in improvements, and changed his circumstances and conditions, relying upon the oral agreement, to such an extent that a refusal on the part of the landlord to perform operates as a fraud on the tenant, there is such part performance as will take the case out of the statute of frauds, and authorize the court to decree specific performance of the parol agreement." 25 R. C. L. 284; Zelleken v. Lynch, 80 Kan. 746, 104 Pac. 563, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 659; Wallace v. Scoggins, 13 Or. 502, 21 Pac. 553, 17 Am. St. Rep. 749.

"Some courts have inclined to the view that there can be no part performance of an oral lease which will take it out of the statute. It is the general view, however, as in case of oral sales or contracts for the sale of land, that part performance under an oral lease or contract for a lease may be such as to take the transaction out of the operation of the statute. The usual ground on which courts of equity interfere in case of oral leases as to which there has been part performance is that equity will not permit the statute to operate as an engine of fraud, or, in other words, that it will interfere for the purpose of preventing the injustice which would arise from permitting a party to escape from the obligations of his agreement, where the other party, on the faith of such agreement, has in presumptively good faith acted in execution thereof." 25 R. C. L. 567, citing Halligan v. Frey, 161 Iowa, 185, 141 N. W. 944, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 112; Parkhurst v. Van Cortland, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 15, 7 Am. Dec. 427; Wallace v. Scoggins, 13 Or. 502, 21 Pac. 553, 17 Am. St. Rep. 749; Seaman v. Aschermann, 51 Wis. 678, 8 N. W. 818, 37 Am. Rep. 849.

In England it has been held that taking possession under the parol lease will of itself alone constitute the necessary part performance. This principle has been repudiated in many states, and has not been adopted in South Carolina. It is conceded everywhere however, that possession and valuable improvements will do so, upon the ground that they amount to such an alteration in the lessee's position as will warrant the court in entering a decree of specific performance. It follows upon the same reasoning that any acts, on the part of the lessee, which have the effect of so altering his circumstances and condition as to make it inequitable on the part of the lessor to insist upon the statute, will have the same effect. The impossibility of the lessee's retracing his steps in the case at bar really presents a stronger case for specific performance than if he had made improvements after taking possession, for the reason that the improvements might be compensated for in money, but his changed position could not be restored or compensated for.

In a note to 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 118, it is said:

Cases supporting the text are cited from C. C. A., Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, Texas, Virginia, Wisconsin, Canada, Ireland, and England.

It has also been held in a majority of cases that payment alone will not constitute part performance. But in those jurisdictions which uphold the doctrine of part performance it is held that possession and payment of rent under the contract do constitute part performance. Certainly it should follow that possession, payment of rent under contract, and the material alteration of the lessee's circumstances and condition will have that effect.

In a note to 17 Am. St. Rep. 756, Judge Freeman says:

"It follows, as a necessary result of the decisions hereinbefore cited, that whether a lease is oral or written is not very material, if the lessee has entered into possession and paid rent under it, and can establish its terms to the satisfaction of the court to which he resorts for the purpose of compelling specific performance. In other words, a lease may be regarded as a sale of a limited interest in real estate, and though, like a sale of the fee, it ought to be evidenced by some writing in substantial conformity to that exacted by the statute of frauds, it may, like a sale of the fee, be followed by acts constituting such part performance as to remove it from the operation of that statute, and entitle the lessee to compel the lessor to execute the appropriate evidence of the demise."

In Seaman v. Aschermann, 51 Wis. 678, 8 N. W. 818, 37 Am. Rep. 849, there was a verbal agreement by defendant (tenant) to lease the plaintiff's store for five years; the plaintiff (landlord) broke off negotiations with another prospective tenant, and went to some expense in altering the store for the defendant's accommodation; the defendant went into possession and paid rent for two years; he declined to execute the lease and plaintiff sued for specific performance. Held, that the landlord was entitled to the relief.

In Eaton v. Whitaker, 18 Conn. 222, 44 Am. Dec. 586, it was held that an agreement to lease land is within the statute of frauds, but that part performance will take it out of the statute; that delivery of possession, continued occupation, and payment of rent according to the terms of the agreement are a sufficient part performance for that purpose. The court makes this significant observation:

"There are many cases where contracts for the absolute sale of the fee of lands have been decreed to be executed, on the ground of part performance; and it would seem not a little remarkable, for a court to hold, that a contract for a three years' lease is, in this respect, in a worse condition than would be a sale of the land is perpetuity."

The point has not been suggested, and I am not to be understood as expressing a definite opinion upon it for the lack of time for investigation, but it is questionable whether the parol agreement under the circumstances is within the statute. The trade was an entire one, that the plaintiff should buy the stock of goods and the defendant Copeland should lease the store. The plaintiff's part of the contract was fully performed, and the defendant should be required to perform his. See Gee v. Hicks, Rich, Eq. Cas. 5; Compton v. Martin, 5 Rich. 14; Hill v. Smith, 12 Rich. 698.

That there was, according to these authorities, sufficient part performance by Workman to take the case out of the statute and to warrant a decree of specific performance I have not a doubt. Workman fully complied with his bargain; paid the purchase price of the stock of goods; went into possession of the stores under the contract; paid the rent every month; and, what is of the greatest consequence in my opinion, so altered his circumstances and condition, that it would be impossible to restore him thereto; he bought a stock of goods had them on his hands with the burden of disposing of them at a profit, embarked upon a new and uncharted sea for him, with all the risks of storm and shipwreck, none of which he would have undertaken but for Copeland's agreement. To hold that at a time of inflated values and rent profiteering Copeland should be allowed to sell his property and the buyer to raise the rent from $500 to $1,500 a year, after the discovery that a verbal lease is good only for one year, is a conclusion to which I do not subscribe.

The argument that Copeland and his company were separate entities, and that for that reason the contracts were separate and distinct, suggests a conclusion that is in the teeth of the facts and has no support in the law. If they were separate entities, I know of no principle of law or justice that would prevent a third party from being bound by his personal undertaking, upon the consideration of which one of the contracting parties assumed obligations to the other. Copeland was deeply interested personally in the corporation and in disposing of the stock of goods which belonged to it; I can see no reason why his personal obligations, which induced the trade with the corporation, should not be supported by the risk of loss which Workman assumed.

I think therefore that the decree should be reversed, and that the case should be re-committed to the special master to complete the testimony and make his report in conformity with the conclusions herein announced, which, however, should not be deemed decisive of the issues of fact in the case.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

MIDGETT v. NORFOLK SOUTHERN R. Co. (No. 17.) (Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.) Appeal from Superior Court, Dare County; Ferguson, Judge. Civil action by John A. Midgett against the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company to recover damages for an alleged negligent injury to plaintiff's property. Upon denial of liability and issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict: "(1) Did the defendant negligently injure the boat of the plaintiff as alleged? Answer: Yes. (2) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: Two hundred dollars." From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the defendant appealed. No error. Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, for appellant. P. W. McMullan, of Elizabeth City, B. G. Crisp, of Manteo, and Aydlett & Simpson, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The only exception, presented for our consideration, comes from his honor's refusal to grant the defendant's motion for judgment as of nonsuit. We have carefully examined the evidence, and have reached the conclusion that the reasonable inferences arising therefrom are sufficient to carry the case to the jury. No material benefit would be derived from setting out the evidence, as it presents only a question of fact. Upon the record and the exceptions, we think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered. No error.

ROLLISON v. ALEXANDER. (No. 171.) (Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 12, 1921.) Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Devin, Judge. Civil action by Charles Rollison against Sam Alexander to recover damages for an alleged negligent personal injury. Upon denial of liability and issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict: "(1) Was plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes. (2) Did plaintiff, by his own negligence, contribute to his injury? A. Yes. (3) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? A. ———." From a judgment in favor of defendant, the plaintiff appealed. No error. D. L. Ward, of Newbern, and F. C. Brinson, of Bayboro, for appellant. Ward & Ward, of Newbern, and Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. An examination of the instant record leaves us with the impression that the case has been tried in substantial conformity to our decisions. Upon the controverted issues of fact, the jury have answered in favor of the defendant; and we have found no material error which would warrant us in disturbing the result. The appeal raises no

STANDARD MFG. CO. v. RAEFORD POWER & MFG. CO. (No. 20.) (Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.) Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Allen, Judge. Civil action by the Standard Manufacturing Company against Raeford Power & Manufacturing Company to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract; plaintiff contending that the defendant had agreed to sell and deliver, as per terms of acceptance, 50,000 pounds of hosiery yarns during the fall of 1919. The negotiations between the parties, leading up to the alleged agreement, are in writing, and consist of certain letters and telegrams, all of which were offered in evidence. His honor, being of the opinion that the plaintiff's evidence was insufficient to establish the existence of a contract, or to show an aggregatio mentium between the parties, granted the defendant's motion for judgment as of nonsuit. Plaintiff appealed. Affirmed. Thompson & Wilson and Geo. J. Spence, all of Elizabeth City, for appellant. Currie & Leach, of Raeford, and Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. No material benefit would be derived from setting out in detail the correspondence had between the parties, and which forms the basis of this suit. Suffice it to say, we have examined the evidence with care, and concur fully with his honor below that no valid or enforceable contract has been shown or established. The judgment of nonsuit must be sustained. Affirmed.

WHITLEY v. KAFIR et al. (No. 27.) (Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.) Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Allen, Judge. Action by W. H. Whitley against O. O. Kafir and another, for trespass involving boundary. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. No error. W. C. Rodman and Ward & Grimes, all of Washington, N. C., for appellant. John H. Bonner and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, all of Washington, N. C., for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The only exception in the record relates to his honor's refusal to give one of plaintiff's special prayers for instructions. While the prayer, as requested, probably states a correct principle of law as an abstract proposition, yet we think it was properly refused under the evidence in the instant case. It omitted all reference to the marked lines, and these should have been considered by the jury, even under the facts stated in the prayer. No error.
